all sorts of instruments for warre, arrows and other weapons, so that all the City was busied herein, and trained their men in warlike discipline. All places were filled with tumults; but the graver sort were very penfive, and many as it were foreseeing the calamitie that after ensued, burst out into tears: they that desired peace, received no comfort in any thing: all things were done at their beck, who were cause of all this warre. And the estate of the Citie even then before the Romanes came, was like a Citie to be destroyed. Now Ananias omitted that which was necessary for warre, and laboured to reconcile the seditious faction of them that were called Zelous: but how he was overcome and what his end was, we will declare hereafter. Now one Simon the sonne of Giora in the Toparchie of Acrabatena, having gathered together a multitude of seditious people, robbed and spoiled all; and not onely brake into rich mens houses, but also did beat them grievously, openly exercising his tyranny. But when Ananias and the rest sent an army against him, he fled unto his fellow theeves of Madda, and there he stayed till Ananias and the rest of his enemies were slain: and then he waited Idumæa with the rest, so that the governours of that place were faine to put a garrison in every village: so great was the number of them that were slain by these theeves. And thus stood the affairs of the Jews.

CHAP. I.

Of VESPASIANs coming into Iudaea, and of the massacre of the Jews.

world, 4031.
after Christ.
Nativity, 69.

After that Nero understood of his evill successe against the Jews, he was seized with feare and astonishment; yet he dissembled it as much as necessity would permit him. In the meane while he set a good face on the matter, and made as though he were of more courage, saying, that that which hapned, was rather by the fault of his Generall, then by the valour of their adversaries: thinking that it behoved him, who was Emperour, not to shew himself moved with a little bad news; and the greatness of his Empire shewed he had a minde which yeelded to no misfortune. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his spirit that he was much moved, and in great care unto whom he should commit the charge of the East, which rebelled; who both would conquer the Jews, and chastise the inhabitants about them, that bare the same minde as they did. At last, he found Vespasian, whom he thought onely meet for that purpose, a man who from his infancy had been trained up in warres, even untill he was gray-headed, who had appeased the people of the West, and helped them being troubled by the Germanes, and recovered it for the Romanes: as also he did Britany, which was unknowne before; and for that cause made his father Claudius triumph without taking any paines for it. Nero considered all these, and his prudence grounded in old age with his experience, who also had sonnes in the flower of their age to be pledges for his fidelitie, and that represented their fathers wisdom, God, as it should seeme, even then disposing something of the whole Common wealth, Nero sent him to governe the armies in Syria, greatly encouraging him with faire speeches and promises, as at that time need required.

Nero is amazed and afraid at the valiant acts of the Jews.

Nero sendeth Vespasian to governe in Syria, and direct his warres.

Vespasian and Titus gather great forces against the Jews.

The Jews besiege Ascalon.

Antonie fighteth with the Jews.

The Romanes overcome the Jews, and make a great slaughter of them.

Ten thousand Jews slaine.

Thus he departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero, and he commanded Titus his sonne to leade the fifth and tenth legions from Alexandria, and he himself crossing over to Hellepont, went after by land into Syria, where he assembled all the Romanes forces, and all the help of the Kings adjoyning that were confederates. But the Jews after Cestius unfortunate successe became proud of their victory, and could not containe themselves; but like men tossed at Fortunes pleasure, they still gave more occasion of warre: and gathering all their warlike forces together, they went to Ascalon, which is an old Citie seven hundredth and twenty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, which the Jews alwaies hated, for which cause also they first assaulted it. The Governours in this expedition, were three men excellent above the rest for strength and wisdom, to wit, Niger of Peræa, Silas the Babylonian, and John the Essene. Now the citie of Ascalon had very strong walls, but few men to defend it, for it had onely one company of footmen, and one band of horsemen, whom Antonius governed. The Jews made such hast, as though they had dwelt hard by, Antonius perswading himself that they would assault him, caused his horsemen to issue forth of the citie; and neither fearing the multitude nor the malice of his adversaries, he valiantly aboad the first assault of the enemies, and beat them back that attempted to assault the wall. So the Jews who were unskilfull, having to do with them that were expert; and they being on foot fighting against horsemen, without order, against those that were in good order; being lightly armed, against their adversaries who were well provided, were easily repulled.

Finally, they were more led by rage and wrath, then by good counsell; and they against whom they fought were obedient, and would do nothing without the commandment of their Leader. For their first ranks being broken, they were forced by the horsemen to turne their backs, and turning themselves to their own company, who turned toward the wall, became as it were enemies to themselves. So that every one seeking to avoid the horsemen, they were all dispersed about the field, which was in every place for the advantage of the horsemen. This greatly helped the Romanes to kill so many Jews: for they that fled were easily overtaken by the Romanes, and killed; and others compassing divers of the Jews about, flew them with darts: so that the Jews were in as great desperation for all their huge multitude, as if they had been alone. The Jews endeavouring to overcome their misfortunes, were ashamed to flie, and so fled not hastily, hoping that fortune would change. But the Romanes not wearied in that which they did with great dexterity, continued the fight the most part of the day: so that there were slain of the Jews ten thousand, and two of their Leaders, John and Silas. The rest, many being wounded, followed their Generall Niger, who fled into a little little town of Idumæa, named Salis: many of the Romanes also were wounded in that fight. But the Jews were not daunted with this misfortune, but the grief thereof much increased their courage: neither were they dismayed with the former losse of so many men within so short time, but rather calling to mind their great victory they had before, were drawn to undergo yet another mishap. Shortly after, before the mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their forces, and went againe to Ascalon in greater number and fury, but with the same successe and skill in warlike affaires which they had before. For Antonius having warning which way they meant to come, placed an ambush in the way, and the horsemen setting upon them at unawares, they killed above eight thousand of them, before they could prepare themselves to fight: and all the rest fled, and Niger with them, shewing as he fled many arguments of a valiant minde: and for that the enemies pursued them, they fled into the safest tower of a town call Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vaine to stay about the tower that was invincible, yet loth to let the Generall of their adversaries to escape, let fire on the walls, and so departing, triumphed, thinking that Niger had been burned. But he leapt into a deepe vault in the Castle, and so escaped, and three daies after he shewed himself unto his souldiers, who sought for him weeping, that they might have his body, for they thought him dead: whom against all expectation seeing alive, they were very glad, as though by Gods providence he escaped to be still their Leader.

Vespasian came to Antiochia, which is the mother citie of Syria, and brought his armie with him, which for greatnesse & happy successe, doubtles was the third in the whole world, and finding that King Agrippa did expect his coming, he hasted with all his forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came unto him the Citizens of Sephoris a Citie of Galilee, who had no thought at all of rebellion: these both provident for their own safetie, and well knowing the forces of the Romanes, before Vespasian came, submitted themselves unto Cestius Gallus, and received from him a garrison of souldiers; and now also courteously entertaining Vespasian, offered their help against their countrey men. To whom Vespasian at their request gave a guard of horse and foot, so great as he thought was able to resist the force of their enemies, if the Jews should attempt any thing against them. For he thought it would be a great help unto him in his warre to come, to have Sephoris the greatest Citie of Galilee situate in a strong place on his side, which otherwise might be a safeguard to the whole nation.

CHAP. II.

The description of Galilæa, and Samaria, and Iudæa.

Here are two places named Galilæa, the one is called high Galilæa, and the other low Galilee: and they are both compassed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the West Ptolemais with the limits of his territorie doth part his borders, and the mount Carmell, which in time past belonged unto Galilee, but now unto the Tyrians: Vnto which adjoyneth Gabaa, which signifieth the horsemens Citie: so called for because King Herods horsemen were sent thither to inhabit. On the South part it joyneth to the Samaritanes and Seythopolitanes unto Jordan. On the East part it bordereth upon Hippene, and Gadaris, and Gaulanitis, which are the borders of King Agrippa his countrey. On the North it bordereth upon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias unto Zabulon; neer which is Ptolemais by the sea coast: In breadth it reacheth from the village Xaloth, situate in a great field, unto Bersabe, where also begins the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth unto the village called Baca, bordering upon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a village neer Jordan named Thella, unto Meroth. And being of such bignesse, and environed with so many nations, yet did they alwayes resist forrain forces. For the Galileans are from their childhood warlike, and never are daunted by fear or penurie: for their countrey is most fruitfull, set with all maner of trees, and very fertile, notwithstanding the inhabitants take small pains in tilling the ground. All parts thereof are tilled by the inhabitants, and there is no waste part.

There are many cities, and in every place there are villages populous and rich: so that the least village there, hath in it above fifteen thousand inhabitants. And although Galilee be lesse in compasse then the region beyond the river, yet it is more populous, fertile and richer then the same: for it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited, for there are many desarts and barren places, and one beareth wilde fruits. Peræa hath a good soil and large field, beset with divers trees, especial- ly olives, vines, and palm-trees: and it is abundantly watred with brooks running from the

A the mountains, and springs that continually come down, when in the Dog dayes they are almost drie. The length of this place is from Macherunt to Pella: the breadth from Philadelphia to Jordan. This town Pella before mentioned, lieth on the North part, and Jordan on the West, and the countrey of the Moabites bordereth on the South, and on the East Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia and Gerasis. Samaria is seated between Judæa and Galilee, beginning at a town situate in a place called Ginæa, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabarena, nothing differing in nature from Judæa. For both of them are full of mountains and fields, and good for tillage; full of trees abounding both with wilde apples and others: for they are of their nature dry, but have rain enough, and have passing sweet waters, and abundance of good grasse, and great store of milch beasts, and which is a great argument of wealth, both places are very populous. The confines of these countries is Anauth, a village B otherwise called Borceos, which lieth on the North part of Judæa. The South part of Judæa, if you measure the length, is extended unto the village of the Arabians, called Jardan: the breadth reacheth from Jordan unto Joppe: in the midst thereof is situate Jerusalem; so that some call that City the navell of the countrey. Judæa also bordereth on the sea-coast, even unto Ptolemais. It is divided into eleven portions: the first is Jerusalem, head and chief of all, being above all the rest, as the head is above the body; and the rest are Toparchies. Gophua is the second, after that Acrabarena, then Thamna, afterward Lydda, also Ammaus, and Pella, and Idumæa, and Engadda, and Herodium, and Jericho: besides these Jamnia and Joppe command the places adjoyning. Moreover, there is Gamala and Gaulanitis, and Baranea and Trachonitis, which are portions belonging to King Agrippa his kingdome. This C countrey beginneth at mount Libanus, and the fountains of Jordan, and reacheth in breadth unto the lake near Tiberias. And in length it reacheth from Julias to Arphas, and the inhabitants are partly Jews, and partly Syrians.

CHAP. III.

How aid was sent unto the people of Sephoris: and of the military discipline of the Romanes.

D Have already spoken of Judæa as briefly as might be, and with what countreys it is environed. Now Vespasian sent help unto the inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thousand horsemen, and six thousand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their Governour: the horsemen divided themselves into two companies, lodged in a great Plain; and the footmen were in garrison in the citie for to defend it, but the horse men stayed without. These horsemen made excursions on every side, and greatly molested Ioseph, who was quietly bent, and also spoiled all that was without the cities, and alwayes repulsed the inhabitants, if at any time they took courage to revenge themselves. Notwithstanding, Ioseph assaulted the city Sephoris, hoping to take it: which he before such time as it revolted unto the Romanes, had compassed with so strong walls, that the Romanes themselves could not have taken it, so his hope was frustrate: for neither by force nor fair means would the Sephorites yeeld unto him. Hereat the Romanes being angry, troubled the countrey more then E before, who now neither night nor day ceased from destroying it, but robbed and spoiled all they found, and all men able to bear arms they slew, and made the rest their slaves: Thus all Galilee was filled with fire and sword, and no man escaped that calamity; onely they saved themselves, that fled into the cities that Ioseph had walled.

Vespasian sendeth help to the Sephorites, but filleth Galilee with sword and fire.

F Titus came to Alexandria being winter, sooner then he was expected: and so received there the souldiers that he was sent for: and having a prosperous journey, he quickly came to Ptolemais, and finding his father there with two of the chiefest legions, to wit, the fifth and tenth, he also adjoynded that fifteenth legion that he brought with him. And there followed them eighteen companies, five out of Cæsarea, one troupe of horsemen, and five companies of horsemen out of Syria: ten of these companies of foot had in every one of them a thousand men, the rest onely six hundred and thirteen, and in every troupe of horsemen were an hundred and twenty. The Kings also brought great aid: for Antiochus, Agrippa and Sohemus, brought each of them two thousand Bowmen, and a thousand horsemen: and Malchus King of Arabia, brought five thousand foot, and one thousand horse, and the most of his footmen were Archers, so that the whole army together with the Kings aid, amounted unto the number of threescore thousand horse and foot together; besides them that followed the camp, who were a great multitude, and not inferiour unto the souldiers in warlike discipline: so that one may admire the Romanes, who so train up their servants in time of peace, that they are very fit for warres. So that whosoever well beholdeth their military discipline, he shall shall perceive that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, but by vertue: for they do not onely then begin to use weapons when they come to fight, but they practise military discipline before they need: and they are not idle in time of peace, but alwayes practise themselves therein without ceasing. Their exercises are like warre it self, and every souldier is every day exercised in every sort of weapons, even as though they were fighting against the enemy; so that hereby they easily endure the burthen and travell of wars. For their disorder doth not make them forget what to do, neither doth feare dismay them, nor continuance of fight and war weary and tire them. So that whosoever they fight against, who are not so well provided in these affaires, as they are, they alwayes overcome them: and one may well call their practices amongst themselves, conflicts without blood-shed; and their wars indeed, conflicts with bloodshed. They are not easily overcome at unawares: for in what enemy-country soever they come, they fight not before they have fortified their camp about, which they do not rashly, neither do they pitch their tents in marish or high places, after a disordered maner, for if the place be unequall, they make it plain. And they proportion their camp foure-square: for they have many Smiths, and all kinde of workmen needfull, which do still follow the army, to accomplish such businesse. And in the innermost part of the camp they make Tabernacles, whose out side resembleth a wall, with towers equally distant one from another, and between them engines of warre to cast stones, and such like, that all kinde of shot may be in readinesse. They also build four gates large and wide, both for their cattell easily to come in at, and also for themselves if need require, to enter in or issue out speedily.

Within the camp, there are streets divided into certain spaces: in the midst their rulers, and amongst them all, the Generals tent like a Temple so that it seemeth a city, and a market full of shops made in an instant. There are also seats builded for the Governours to judge of controversies, if any arise between the souldiers and others. All this place and all things belonging thereto are made in an instant, partly by reason of the multitude, partly by the industry of such as worke: and if need require, they compass it with a trench foure cubits deep, and as many broad. Thus the souldiers enclosed with armes, do live quietly in their tents, without disorder, and all things are done with good advice and order, whether they need water, or corne, or wood: for they must all go to dinner at the time appointed, and all sleep apace, and a trumpet giveth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded. In the morning, all the souldiers come unto their captains to salute them, the captains to the tribunes, and they all to the Generall, & he giveth them a watch-word, and telleth them what he thinketh good, & how they shall behave themselves towards those that are under them, whereby in fight they may demean themselves, and well know when to assault, and when to retire. When they go forth of the camp, a trumpet soundeth, and no man is idle, but at the first beck taketh away his tabernacle, & maketh all ready for their departure. Then the trumpet soundeth againe, warning them to be ready: and having laden their beasts with their baggage, they expect the sound again, as though they were to run a race, and at their departure they burne their camp, because it is easie to build the like again, and also lest afterwards it may advantage their enemies. When the trumpet hath sounded the third time, which is a signe to set forward, then they hasten those that are slow, lest they forsake their order. And a crier standeth on the right hand of their Generall, asking thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often answer that they are, holding up their right hands with a lofty courage: and so they march on easily, every man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to give battell. The footmen have a head-piece, a brest-plate, and a sword on the left side, and on the right side a dagger. The footmen guarding the Generall, have a javelin and a shield: the rest, armed every one with bucklers and pikes. Moreover they carry a saw, a basket, a fardle, a hatchet, also a cord, a sythe, a chaine, and victuals for three daies, so that the footmen are as much laden as the cattell. The horsemen carry at their right side along sword, in the left hand a dart, and a long shield hanging against the horse side, and a quiver with three darts with broad edges, which are as big as a speare: they have also helmets and brest-plates like the footmen. And the Generals horsemen that guard his body, do nothing differ from the rest. That company alwayes leadeth, that the los falleth unto. And these are the fashions of the Romans concerning their warlike discipline. They never do any thing unadvisedly in battell, but manage all things according to counsell, so that they either do not erre, or if they do, their fault is easily amended. For they think that bad success after deliberation, is better then good fortune without it, and they think that therein fortune did but flatter them, to work them some great despight, by reason they have not deliberated: but that which is premeditated, although it have evill success, yet it maketh them

A them wary against another time. And none of them accounts that good successe, which cometh by chance, and yet every one is comforted in their misfortune, for that they take good advice. By the military exercises they do not onely make the bodies of their souldiers strong, but their mindes also more hardy: and their diligence is the greater by their fear. For their lawes are capitall, not onely for them that forsake their order, but also for them that commit the least enormity or negligence; and their Generals are more severe then their lawes: who onely by rewarding the good, purchase favour, lest they seem cruell in punishing the wicked. Moreover, they are so obedient to their Rulers, that in peace they honour them, and in warre the whole army seemeth one body united together: they so keep order, and are so ready to turne here or there, and so attentive to any command, and also diligent to note signes made unto them, and so quicke to labour with their hands, that they are alwaies apt to do any thing, but slow to endure. Insomuch that they know no place, where they have been overcome, either by number, or courage, or counsell, or by the difficulty of the place, nor by fortune it self: For they think victory more certaine then fortune. Therefore seeing that their deeds are ruled by advice and counsell, and their commandments so well fulfilled by the armie, what marvell is it if their Empire in the East reach unto Euphrates, in the West unto the Ocean, in the South unto Affrick, in the North unto Rhene and Danubius? seeing that one may justly affirme the possession lesse then the possessors. This I have spoken, not to praise the Romanes, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie those that desire alteration: and perhaps it may teach them who want good discipline, and are ignorant of the maners and customes of the Romanes in their militarie affairs. But I return to my purpose.

The year of the world, 4031. after Christ's Nativity, 69.

The Romanes grow more diligent by fear. The obedience of the Roman souldier is no small occasion of his victory.

How farre the Roman government extendeth.

CHAP. IIII.

How PLACIDUS assaulted JOTAPATA.

IN the meane time Vespasian living at Ptolemais with his son Titus, prepared his armie. But Placidus was already entred into Galilee and runne thorow it, where he slew almost all he found who were of the weaker sort of people and cowards: And seeing that those of courage alwaies fled into the Cities that Ioseph had fortified, he turned his forces against Jotapata, which was the strongest of them, thinking it might easily be taken by a sudden assault, and that he thereby should get great glory, and that by taking it great profits might ensue, in that the people seeing the strongest Citie surprized, they would not flie to any againe. But it fell not out as he expected; for the people of Jotapata understanding of his comming, met him neer the towne, and suddenly encountering the Romanes, being a great multitude and well disposed to fight, as those that bare armes for the generall safetie of the countrey, and the lives of their wives and children, they put the Romanes to flight, wounding many, onely seven being slaine: for the Romanes in flying kept their ranks: and being armed round about, they were not dangerously wounded; but the Jews being unarmed, rather trusted to their darts and arrows then to handy blows. There were three Jews slain, and a few wounded: and so Placidus when he saw himself repulsd from the town, he fled.

VESPASIAN desirous to take Galilee himself, departed from Ptolemais, making such journeys as souldiers ought to keep, which the Romanes are wont to follow. And he commanded those that came to help him, and the bowmen because they were lighter armed, to go before and repress the enemies incursions, and search the wood and Forrest fit for ambushes, whereby they were to passe: after them followed part of the Roman footmen and horsemen: and after them there marched ten by ten out of every hundreth, bearing with them their armour, and the measures of their camp. After them followed men, whose office it was to mend the waies, where they were bad, and cut down the woods that were in the way, lest with bad way the army were tyred. After them he sent his baggage and the baggage of the Rulers under him, and withall horsemen to guard it. And after them he himself followed, leading an army of chosen footmen and horsemen, accompanied with his own guard of horsemen; and he had out of every legion sixscore men for his own guard. After followed they that carried the engines to batter the walls of the cities, & other instruments, and with the Prefects and Tribunes, guarded with their chosen souldiers. After them other Ensignes, and the Eagle, the which the Romanes hold for chiefe of all, because it is the King of all birds, and is most valiant and strong: wherefore they think it a signe of dominion and victory; over all them against whom they beare it. After these sacred Ensignes followed the Trumpets sounding in warlike maner; and after them the army marching, fix in a rank; and as the custome is, a Centurion went by them to keep order: the servants were all with the footmen and baggage. After the last company who were hyred, followed armed footmen and horsemen in great number. And thus Vespasian with his whole army came unto the borders of Galilee: and there pitching his Tents, he stayed the souldiers who were very eager to fight; as it were boasting and shewing his army to terrifie his adversaries, and giving them time to repent, if any one would alter his minde before the warre began, yet did he prepare to besiege the walls and fortresses. The onely sight of him made many rebels flie, and daunted the most of them. For Josephs souldiers who had pitched his Tents a little from Sephoris, when they knew that warre grew on, and that they were presently to fight with the Romanes, they did not onely flie before they fought: but also before they saw their enemies. Joseph being left with a very few, knowing he was not able to abide the enemies; and that the Jews were discomfited, and that if he put any trust in them, they would for the most part revolt unto the enemies; for that time abstained from all warre, and thought to get himself out of danger: and so accompanied with them that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

Joseph is afraide of the Romanes, and writeth to Jerusalem.

VESPASIAN went unto Gadara, and took it at the first assault: for all able men fit for warre were fled out of the Citie: and entring the Citie, he put all to death. For the Romanes had no mercy, partly for the hatred they conceived against the Jews, and partly in revenge of that which had befallen Cestius. And they burned the citie and all townes and villages adjoyning: some of them being already desolate, and the inhabitants of the rest were made slaves. Joseph fled into the citie which he made choice of for his safegard, and filled it with fear. For the people of Tiberias thought he would never have fled, if there had been any hope of withstanding the Romanes: wherein they judged not amisse, for he did foresee what event those wars would have, and that their onely safety consisted in changing their rebellious mindes. He himself, though he hoped to obtain pardon of the Romanes, yet had he far more rather have died, then to have lived pleasantly with them against whom he was sent, and so become a traitor unto his countrey committed to his charge. Wherefore he determined faithfully to write all his estate, and the estate of the countrey unto the Nobility at Jerusalem, and not to extoll the enemies forces too much, lest they should say he was a coward, nor yet putting them in any comfort, lest perhaps they now penitent for that they had done, again by his letters should be incited to go forward in their rebellious course: willing them presently to write an answer, whether they thought it good to enter the league with the Romanes; or if they would make warre, then they should send a sufficient armie against the Romanes: and having written to this effect, he presently sent men away to Jerusalem to bear these letters.

Joseph comes to Jotapata from Tiberias.

besieged.

VESPASIAN was very desirous to take Jotapata, for that he knew many of his enemies were fled thither, and for that this was the strongest refuge they had. So he sent before footmen and horsemen, to plain the wayes which were full of ragged stones, so that it was hard for footmen to passe, and altogether impossible for horsemen: who within four dayes effected that which they were commanded, and made a large way for the army to passe: And the fifth day which was the one and twentieth of March, Joseph before they came entred into the citie, coming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Jews who were dismayed. A certain run-away told Vespasian that Joseph was come thither, willing him to hasten thither, for if he could take Joseph, he might easily take all Judæa. Hereat Vespasian was very glad, and took it as good fortune, that the most prudent and potent of his enemies, should (God at that time so working) put himself as it were in hold; and so presently he sent Placidus before with a thousand horsemen, and with him Captain Eburus, a man both strong, valiant and prudent, and commanded them to compass the Citie with a siege, lest left Ioseph should privily escape from thence. The day after he himself followed with the whole army, and about noon came to Jotapata, and leading his army unto the North side of the town, he pitched his tents upon a hill seven foulds distant from the city. Upon purpose placing himself within the view of his enemies, that the very sight of his army might terrifie them: which he also did; for presently every one was in such a fear, that none durst go out of the citie. The Romanes being wearied all that day, would not assault the city: wherefore they invironed the town with two squadrons, and the third that consisted in horsemen, was placed without to intercept all passage, that none of the Jews could passe any whither. Hereby the Jews now in desperation took heart; for in warre nothing is more forcible then necessitie. The next day began the battery, and every Jew kept his quarter, and kept themselves in order, and resisted the Romanes before their walls. But when Vespasian sent all the bowmen, and those who cast darts and other things to beat them off from the wals, and he himself with footmen assaulted the wals in another place where they might easily be entred; then Ioseph fearing the city, accompanied with all the people issued out of the town, and assaulted the Romanes fiercely, and did drive them from the walls, shewing courage and strength: and they themselves suffered as much harm as they did unto their enemies. For as they were encouraged with desperation, so were the Romanes with shame, who were armed with military knowledge and strength, and the Jews onely with anger. And the fight continued all day even untill night; wherein many Romanes were wounded, and onely thirteen slain: and of the Jews there were six hundreth wounded, and 17. slain. The next day also they met the Romanes, and resisted them more stoutly then before, taking courage for that they the day before had resisted them, contrary to their expectation: and all the Romanes fought more valiantly, ashamed as it were of themselves, in suffering the Jews to resist them; thinking withall that they themselves were overcome, if they did not quickly suppress their enemies. Wherefore the Romanes for five dayes together ceased not to assault the town, and the Jews strongly rebatted them: and now neither the Jews feared their enemies, nor the Romanes were dismayed with the difficulty of taking the town. Jotapata is almost all situate upon a rock, and compassed about with deep valleys, which descend straight down like a wall: so that one can scarcely see the bottome. There is onely accessse unto it on the North part, where it is seated upon a mountain going overthwart; which Ioseph inclosed with a wall, to the end it might be no passage for the enemies: all the rest of the citie is environed with high mountains, so that it cannot be discerned by any before they be hard at it: And Jotapata was thus strengthened.

Vespasian determined both to strive against the nature of the place, and hardinesse of the Jews; and therefore called all his Captains together, and consulted with them to begin a hot siege: at last they resolved to rear a mount in that place where the citie was easiest to be entred. He sent his whole army to provide wood to do it, who cut down the mountains neer unto the town: and great store of wood and stone being brought, setting hurdles before them to bear off the darts and arrows, he began to raise a mount; so that they received little or no harm by darts cast from off the wals: others brought earth from places thereabout, and no man was idle. The Jews cast continually great stones and all kinde of darts upon that which defended them, which though they pierced not thorow, yet they made a great noise and terrified the workmen. Which Vespasian seeing, caused all engines that did cast stones and darts, which were in number an hundred and threescore, to be placed against the walls, to beat the Jews from thence. And so they cast stones, and darts, and fire, and arrows in great abundance: so that they did not onely beat the Jews from off the walls, but also out of the reach of their shot, for both the Arabian archers and those that used slings and darts, and all the engines continually played upon them. For all this the Jews rested not, but running out in companies as thieves, they took away that which defended the workmen, and then assaulted them having no defence: and when they had beaten them away, destroyed and fired all that the Romanes had wrought for their own defence and safeguard. At last Vespasian perceived that these damages hapned for that there was space left between all these works, whereby the enemies had accessse to do them such harms: wherefore he united them together, and so hindred the privy excursions of the Jews. When the mount was almost made and the towers upon it finished, Ioseph afraid to do nothing for the safeguard of the town, called all workmen necessary together, and commanded them to make the wall there higher; but they said it was impossible for them to work, for the number of shot in that place. Then Ioseph made this device to defend them: he fixed stakes in the ground, and fastned unto them hides of Kine and oxen new slain, by which they were defended from shot, and fire, so that they labouring night and day raised the wall twenty cubits high, erecting also upon it many towers:

and by this means made it a strong defence. Whereat the Romanes, who before thought themselves sure of the town, were now greatly dismayed both by this device of Iosephs, and also by the hardinesse of the Jews.

His stratagem and the carriage of the Jews greatly moved Vespasian: for now they receiving courage in that defence, made assaults upon the Romanes of their own accord, and every day skirmished, running out in companies, and like thieves, taking away whatsoever they lighted upon; and what they could not carry away, they set on fire. At last Vespasian would not permit his souldiers to fight any longer: but determined now to besiege it and take it by want of victuals, purposing either to make them come and yeeld themselves for lack of food, or if they held out, to famish them: and that it would be more easie to take it by force, if ceasing awhile from assaulting it, he afterward set upon it, they being in anguish for the danger they were in. Wherefore he commanded all passages to be kept, that none could go out of the city. But they had great store of corn, and of all other things else, except salt and water, whereof they stood in great want: for there is never a fountain in the city, and they have little rain in Summer-time, so that the inhabitants were in great distresse; for now there was hardly any water left in the city. Ioseph perceiving there was abundance of all things else, and that the citizens were valiant, as also the siege like to continue long, he gave to every one water in measure: with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether, as to have it in that maner, and now they began to faint, as though they had suffered extreme drought. The Romanes perceiving this, being upon a high hill, over against the place whither all the Jews came together to receive water, they with their shot killed many that came thither, insomuch that Vespasian hoped that within short time their water would be spent, and they constrained to yeeld. But Ioseph to frustrate this hope, commanded a great many garments to be laid in water and hanged upon the walls, so that the water might runne down on every side. When the Romanes saw this, they were much grieved & afraid, for that they wasted so much water in mockery, and before had thought that they had wanted water to drink. And now Vespasian scorning to win the City by siege, purposed to assault it again by force. The Jews were very glad of this: and the Citie being in danger, rather wished to be slain then perish through hunger or thirst. Ioseph devised also another way to get such necessities as he wanted, out of the countrey: for there was a valley out of the way, and therefore not regarded by the Romanes: wherefore Ioseph sent men into the countrey to his friends for such things as the city wanted, by this way, commanding them when they came neer the watchmen, to hide and cover themselves with hairy skinned, that the watchmen might think them to be dogs: and this he used a good space, till at last the watchmen perceived it, and so set a guard there to stop the passage. When Ioseph perceived the Citie could not hold out long, and fearing his own life, if still he continued there, he treated with the chief of the citie that he might flie. But the people perceiving his intent, flocked about him, and besought him to take pitié upon them, and not forsake them, who had no hope but in him, affirming that for his sake they were all couragious and bold to fight; and if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort unto them, telling him that it did not become him to flie from his enemies, nor to forsake his friends, neither as it were to leap out of a ship shaken with a tempest, into the which he came when the Seas were calm, for so by this means he would soon overthrow the citie, and once gone, no man afterward could or durst resist their enemies, for in him was all their hope.

Ioseph kept it to himself that his purpose was to work his own safetie: for he told them the thing which he intended was for their good, affirming that though he stayed still in the citie, yet he could do them little good: and if the citie should chance to be taken, then he and they were like to perish, but if he were abroad and not besieged, he could do them great good: for he would presently assemble all the people of Galilee, and come against the Romanes, and so raise their siege, whereas now in staying with them, he saw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romanes against them, making them more earnest to take the town then they would be, onely because he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that he were fled, they would not then be so earnest in the siege.

A Ioseph herewith could not perswade the people, but they flocked faster about him, and both young and old of all sorts came and prostrated themselves at his feet, weeping, and beseeching him to take such hap as should befall them, whether it were good or bad; not for that they envied his escape, but for that they hoped they should receive no harme if he remained with them.

The year of the world, 4031. after Christs Nativite, 69.

He then bethought himself that if he stayed with them, he fulfilled their request; and if he denied, he feared they would force him. Wherefore being partly moved by compassion, he determined to stay, and being now, as all the citie was, desperate, he told them that now it was time to fight, seeing there was no hope of safety: and that it was a goodly matter to spend their lives renownedly, and do some noble act to leave a remembrance unto their posteritie of their valour: and went about it. And so issuing out of the citie with the most valiant among them, when he had killed the watchmen, at the first encounter he came even unto the Romanes tents, and tore the skins that their tents were made of, and fired others, and their engines: and so he did the second and third day, and for certaine daies and nights afterward never ceased. When Vespasian perceived the Romanes greatly endamaged by such incursions, and very loth to flye for shame, and not able to follow them being so loaden with their armour, and that the Jews alwaies did some exploit before they retired themselves into the citie; he gave commandement unto his souldiers to leave their assault, and not to fight against men who desired to die, affirming that no men were stronger then those in desperation, and that if they found none to assaile, their courage would soone be alaid; like unto aflame of fire, when the matter that nourisheth it is consumed. Moreover, the Romanes must seek victory more warily, for that they fought not for necessitie, but onely to increase their dominions: and after that, oftentimes they beat the Jews by the Arabian archers, and with slings and darts, and other shot which never ceased, and so the Jews by this meanes were repressed. But so soon as they were without the danger of the shot, they more furiously assailed the Romanes, sparing neither body nor minde, but continually fought by turnes, and every one of the citie assisted them that so laboured.

CHAP. IX.

How Vespasian did beat the wals of Iorapata with a Ramme, and other warlike Engines.

VESPASIAN thinking himself as it were besieged, both for the long time which he had continued the siege, and also for the divers assaults and privy excursions of the Jews, having now almost raised the Rampires as high as the wals of the City, determined to batter them with a Ramme. A Ramme is a huge beam like the mast of a ship, whose end is armed with a strong massive iron, made in the form of a Rammes head: whereupon it takes his name, because he butteth with his head. It hangeth on another beam with ropes, like the beam of a pair of ballances: the beam it hangeth on lying acrosse, is held up with two props, which being drawn back by force of many men, and then joynly with all their forces shooed forward, it striketh the wall with the head of iron: And there is no wall nor tower so strong, but though it abide the first stroke of the Engine, yet can it not hold out long. The Generall of the Romanes thought good to use this means to take the citie by force, for that the siege was dangerous, by reason that the Jews never rested; so the Romanes with all kinde of shot endeavoured to beat the Jews from off the wals that made any resistance: and the archers and they who used slings, were hard by: and when they saw that none of the Jews durst come upon the wals, they applyed the Ramme unto them, and covered it aloft with hurdles and skinnes, both for to defend themselves and the engine, and at the first assault the wals were shaken, so that the citizens cried, as though the town had been already taken. Ioseph seeing them still beat one place, and that presently the wall would fall, devised a way to resist the force of the Ramme, and so he filled sacks with chaffe, and let them down off the wall just against that place, where the Ramme strook ordinarily, and so brake the force of the blows, the loosenesse of the chaffe making no resistance; and so drowning or abating the violence of the stroke. By this means the Romanes were hindred: for whithersoever they brought the Ramme, thither did they upon the wals also remove the sacks of chaffe, and brake the force thereof: till at last the Romanes also devised a way to cut these sacks, taking long poles and binding Siches unto the end of them, and so cut these sacks of chaffe. And the Ramme shook the wall, and the wall newly built was not strong enough to resist. Then Ioseph and his souldiers fought to help themselves by fire-works, and so they fired all that was made of dry wood in three severall places, and withall the engines, and forts, and mounts of the Romanes, who now had much ado to defend them.

themselves: first, because that they were terrified with the valour of the Jews: and secondly, because every one had work enough to defend himself against the fire, which seizing upon dry matter with Brimstone and Pitch wonderfully increased; so that in one hours space it consumed all the works that the Romanes had made with so great labour. There was a Jew the sonne of Samaus called Eleazar, who deserved eternall memory: this man was born at Saab in Galilee. This Eleazar took up a great stone, and cast it down with such force upon the Ramme, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing leapt down amongst the midst of his enemies, and brought it away into the Citie: at the last being unarmed, and as it were a mark for his enemies to shoot at, he received in his body five arrows; and as though he had not felt them, so soon as he had gotten up the wall where all might see him, he boldly stood still, and so through grief of his wounds having the head of the Ramme in his arms fell down. Next unto him two brethren of Ramath in Galilee shewed themselves valiant, named Netiras and Philip, who assaulted the tenth legion of the Romanes with such violence, that they brake their ranks, and put all to flight that sought to withstand them: which Joseph and those that were with him perceiving, took fire and burnt the engines, works, and defences of the fifth and tenth legions that were fled, and those that followed destroyed all engines, and other matter that was left. In the evening the Romanes erected the Ramme against that part of the Citie which before they had beaten, and so began afresh to shake the wall in the same place that before they had battered: and one of the Jews shot an arrow from the wall, and wounded Vespasian in the sole of the foot, yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the arrow was spent before it came to him, having come a great way off.

This fact greatly troubled the Romanes, who seeing Vespasian bleed, presently spread these news through the whole army, and almost all of them came running to see their Generall, and especially Titus who feared his fathers death: so that the whole army partly for the love of their Generall, and partly for the fear of Titus his son, were greatly troubled: but Vespasian presently freed the army from all perturbation; and his son Titus from fear. For the griefe of the wound being past, he shewed himself to all that were sorrowfull for him, and incited them to fight against the Jews more earnestly then before; and now every one as it were to revenge their Generall, despised all danger, and assaulted the wals, one exhorting another. Joseph and his associates, notwithstanding that many of them were killed with shot, darts and arrowes; yet they forooke not the walles, but with fire and sword, and stones fiercely assaulted them, that being defended with hurdles, battered the walls with the Ram, but to little purpose: for they were continually killed, being in sight of their enemies, and for that they could not see them, presently were striken downe, for their fire did make such a light as though it had been day, so that the Romanes easily perceived whither to direct their shot: and for that their engines were not perceived afarre off, the Jews could not defend themselves from the arrowes and stones that were shot against them, by which meanes many of them were slaine, and the tops and corners of the towers beaten down. And there was no man so well guarded, but he was slaine by force of those stones; so that any man may know of what force that engine is, by that which hapned that night. For one that stood neer Joseph upon the wall was striken with a stone, and his head carried from his body by violence of that blow three furlongs, as though it had been cast out of a sling: and the next day a woman great with childe was striken on the belly with one of those stones, and the childe carried forth of her from the place where she was striken three furlongs; so great was the force of this engine: Therefore the violence of the engines was more terrible, and likewise the noise of darts, arrowes and other shot. And many were slaine on every side, and the bodies of those that were killed, striken against the wall made a noise: and within the Citie was heard a pitifull lamentation, and weeping amongst the women; and without, a heavy mourning and cry of them, that were wounded to death; and all that part of the wall where the fight was, flowed with blood: so that now the multitude of dead bodies had so filled the ditch before the wall, that the Romans might easily passe over them into the Citie, and the mountaines about did eccho with the cries of the Citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the eye or eare move terror. And many stoutly fighting for Jotapata dyed most valiantly, many also were sore wounded: and notwithstanding the wall was continually battered, yet it was almost morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ramme. And then they of Jotapata repaired the breach with their bodies and armour, before the Romanes could set bridges to enter it.

IN the morning Vespasian brought his army to enter the breach, having given them but little rest after their whole nights labour: and desirous to make the Jews that defended the breach, to forsake their place, before such time as he entered, he took the most valiant of his horsemen, and unhorsed them, being armed from the head to the foot, and placed them in three ranks, that they, being so armed, might besiege round that part of the wall that was battered, and so take long pikes in their hands, so that as soon as the bridges were set, they should first enter the breach.

After them he placed the strongest of his footmen: the rest of his horsemen he set round about the city upon the mountain, to the end that none might escape thereabout: after the footmen he commanded archers to follow with their arrows ready in their hands, and them that used slings also, and other engines for shot. And he caused other to scale the wals, where they were not battered, to the intent that the townsmen, busied in resisting them, might leave the breach unmanned; and the rest being wearied and oppressed with the thicknesse of the shot, should of force forsake their standing. But Ioseph, perceiving his intent, placed old men and children, and those that were already wearied, upon those parts of the wals that were not battered: and himself with the stoutest of the city went to defend the breach, and placed six men before them, whom he chose out, himself being one of them, to sustain the first brunt of their enemies assault: commanding them likewise to stop their ears, to the end that they might not be terrified with the cries of the army. He willed them also to defend themselves with shields against the darts and arrows, and gave back a little, till such time as the archers quivers were emptied: and if so be that the Romanes should offer to make bridges, that then they with their instruments should resist; and that every one should now fight, not to defend his countrey, but as it were to recover it being in a maner already lost; and imagine, that they now did see their aged men slain with their children, and their wives almost taken by their enemies, and now to revenge themselves upon those that hereafter would massacre their whole city: and thus he appointed men in both places. The weaker multitude, women and children, seeing the city compassed about with three ranks of horsemen, and that the Romanes with their swords drawn pressed against the breach, that all the mountains about did shine and glitter with their weapons that were placed there, and certain Arabians to serve the archers with arrows: they cried out as though the city were now taken, so that a man would have judged them already amidst their enemies swords, and not onely in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Ioseph commanded the women to their houses, lest their cries should effeminate his souldiers minds; willing them likewise to keep silence, and threatned them if they did not: and so he marched to the breach, which place fell to his lot, and gave no heed to them that sought to scale the wals, but onely beheld afarre off the force of the arrows.

EWhen all the trumpets began to sound, and the aire to be obscured with the multitude of arrows, Iosephs companions, remembering the charge given them, stopped their ears, and armed their bodies against the shot of arrows: And so soon as the bridges were set against the wall, presently they ran, and before the Romanes could enter upon them, they got them into their hands, and resisted them that sought to come upon them, shewing great prowesse and strength, and themselves no way inferiour unto the Romanes, though they were in extreame danger, and the Romanes in none: and did not give one foot back, till either they did kill or were killed. But the Jews had not any fresh men to second them that were tired, and the Romanes, still as they were wearied, sent fresh supply, and joyning together their long shields, exhorting one another, they became as it were a wall or defence invincible, and the whole army like one body did bear back the Jews, and so set foot on the wals. Then Ioseph, in this desperate case, devised some way to repell this present calamity: wherefore he commanded the Jews to fetch scalding oyle, which they had ready, and powre it upon the Romanes yet seething, who also cast the pans upon them. This device brake the ranks of the Romanes, so that with great pain and grief they fell from the wall, and tumbled down: for the scalding oyle easily got between their flesh and armour, and scorched them like fire being easily heated, and long continuing hot by reason of the fatnesse, and the Romans being loaden with helmets and brest-plates, could not flee; so that some leapt down off the bridge, and others for grief died; others would faine have retired themselves, but could not, because their enemies followed them so hard. But neither the Romanes wanted vertue and valour in aduerse fortune, nor the Jews prudence and good advice. For the Romanes, notwithstanding they were in intolerable pain, being scalded with hot oyle, yet did they freshly assault them that hurt them, and every one did thrust him forward that was before him, as it were desirous to shew their courage. Then the Jews used another device to make them retire: for they powred fenugreek boyled upon the bridge, so that they slid down: and neither they that would have fled, nor they who did strive to assault the Jews, could stand upon their feet, it was so slippery; and many falling down upon the bridge, were by their own company trodden to death; others did slide down upon the Rampier; and alwaies as they fell, the Jews strook them: and seeing that the Romans were retired from the place, so that now they were not forced to handy blows, they had leifure to shoot arrows and darts against them. When Vespasian saw that his men in that fight indured much misery, towards evening he caused them to retire, many being slain, and more wounded, and 6. men of Jotapata were slain, and above 300. wounded: this fight was upon the 20. day of June. But after that Vespasian had comforted his souldiers for that which had hapned, and perceiving that they were angry, and desired to fight to revenge themselves, so that they needed no exhortation; he raised the Rampier higher, and erected three towers 50. foot high, covering them aloft with iron, that so by reason of their waight they might stand stedfast, and not be consumed by fire: and these he placed upon the Rampiers, and in them Archers, and men that cast darts and such like: who not being perceived of them that were upon the wall, by reason of the highnesse of the towers, and the covering thereof, easily wounded them who were placed thereon. So the Jews, when they could not avoid the arrows, nor be revenged upon them whom they could not see, nor yet fire the towers being covered with plates of iron, forsook the wals; yet alwaies encountred with them who sought to enter. And the people of Jotapata thus resisted, notwithstanding that many every day were slain, and that they did their enemies no harme without great danger to themselves.

How Japha was taken by TRAIANUS and TITUS.

AT this time Vespasian understood that Japha, a City neer Jotapata, minded to rebell, encouraged so to do, for that they understood how they of Jotapata had held out contrary to all expectation: wherefore he sent thither Trajanus, Governour of the tenth legion, and with him 2000. footmen, and a thousand horse: who perceiving the town able to resist, and the inhabitants prepared for to fight, and come out to meet him (for the town being for the situation strong enough, it was also compassed with a double wall) seeing this, he fought with them, and after a while put them to flight, and the Romanes following them, brake in with them at the first gate: which the Citizens perceiving, shut the second gate, not suffering their own Citizens to enter in, for fear that the enemies also should rush in with them, as they had done into the first gate. Truly, God gave that victory unto the Romanes, whose will it was that all the warlike men of the Citie should have their own gates shut upon them, and so fall into their enemies hands, who were most greedy to destroy them. For many came to the gates, and called those that kept them by their names, pitifully intreating that they might come in: which whilest they did, they were butchered like sheep, being enclosed between two wals: their own Citizens having shut one gate upon them, and the Romanes the other: and many thus enclosed perished with their fellows swords, and an infinite number by the rage of the Romanes, having no courage to resist and revenge themselves. For the treason of their own Citizens, and the terrour of their enemies together, utterly discouraged them, and so they died all in number 12000. not cursing the Romanes, but the Jews their own countrey men. Trajanus, thinking that the city was now destitute of fighting men, or if any were within, that they durst not resist being thus terrified, reserved the taking of the city for the Generall, and sent messengers unto him, requesting him to send his sonne Titus to make an end of the victory. Vespasian, fearing that yet there would be some resistance, sent Titus with 500. horsemen, and 1000. foot: who hastning thither, placed Trajanus on the left side of the town, and himself on the right: so the Romans on every side scaled the wals, and the Galileans having a while resisted, presently left them. Then Titus and his followers leaping down, presently got into the city, and began a vehement fight with them that were assembled therein, some valiantly issuing out of the narrow streets, and assaulting them, and the women casting such things as they could get, upon the Romanes from the tops of their houses, and thus they held battell six hours. When their fighting men were all slain, then the old men and children, and all the other company

A company both in the streets and in their houses were soon dispatcht, so that none of them were left alive, save onely infants, who with the women were led captives. The number of them that were slain, both in the city and in the first conflict, amounted to 15000. and the number of those that were led into captivity, were 1000, 100, and 30. And this massacre of the Galileans hapned the 25. day of June.

How CAEREALIS conquered the Samaritanes.

B He Samaritanes also were partakers of this calamitie, who assembled themselves together in mount Garizin, which they account a sacred place. But both their assembly and their courage did portend their warres: and not warned by their neighbours harmes, nor with any advice or judgement considering their own infirmitie, and the Romanes power, began to be tumultuous. Vespasian foreseeing this, thought it good to prevent them: and although all the region of Samaria had garrisons in it, yet for all the great multitude assembled, it was thought that the garrisons were able to keep them under. Wherefore he sent thither Cerealis, the Tribune of the fift legion, with 600. horsemen, and 3000. footmen. Cerealis thought it not the best way to goe unto the mountain, and fight with the whole multitude, because a great many of their enemies were upon it: wherefore he commanded his souldiers to beleaguer the mountain about, at the foot thereof, and to keep them there all the whole day. There hapned at that time a vehement heat, and the Samaritanes wanted water: for it was then Summer, and the people had not provided themselves of victuals, so that many in one day onely for want of drink died of thirst, the rest preferred death before the misery they indured, and so fled to the Romanes: of whom Cerealis learned that those that yet remained on the mount, were even dismayed by the misery they endured. Wherefore he ascended the mountain, and compassing about the enemies with his army, he first exhorted them to yeeld, willing them to save themselves, promising them all their lives, if they would cast down their weapons: but nothing prevailing with them, he set upon them, and kild them all, in number 11000. and 600. and this was done the 27. day of June. And these were the miseries that befell the Samaritanes.

E He Citizens of Jotapata indured this hard siege contrary to all expectation, and in the seven and fourtieth day, the Romanes mounts were raised higher then their wals: on the same day one of the City fled unto Vespasian, and told him in what case the city stood, and how few citizens were left, and that with daily watchings and fighting they were farre spent, whereby they were not able to resist any more, and that they might be taken by policy if they were followed: for in the last part of the night, being weary, they ceased from their labour, and slept untill the morning: wherefore he perswaded Vespasian to assault them at that time. But Vespasian knowing how faithfull the Jews were one unto another, and how they contemned all punishment, gave little credit to this run-away: for a little before, one of Jotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confesse, or disclose the estate of the city, whom the fire nothing moved, and so at last he was crucified, laughing and scorning death: yet a probable conjecture which he had, perswaded him to give credit somewhat to this traitors words: and for that he knew no great harme could befall him, if he so assaulted the city as the traitor willed, he commanded the man to be kept, and made all his army in readinesse to assault the town. So at the houre appointed, he made towards the wall with silence, Titus being the first, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus a tribune, and a few of the 15. legion: who killing the watchmen, entred into the city, and after them Sextus Cerealis and Placidus, with their companies, so the Castle was taken, and the enemies were in the midst of the town, and it was faire day-light, and yet the townsmen knew nothing, being now fast asleep after their great labours and watchings: and they that did watch could see nothing, there was so thick a mist by chance that morning, and the rest never wakened till death was at their doore; and that they perceived their calamity and destruction. The Romanes mindefull of all that had befallen them in the time of

of the siege, did neither spare nor pity any one: but driving the people out of the higher part of the city into the lower part thereof, they massacred them all, where they that would, could not fight for the narrowness of the place: so being cumbered for want of roome, and sliding down the banks for haste, their enemies still pursuing them, they were easily slain. Many of Iosephs guard seeing this that they could not fight, gathered themselves together in a corner of the city, and slew themselves, that the Romanes might not kill them. But some of the watchmen, who first perceived the city to be taken, fled into a tower, and resisted a while (this tower was situate on the North side of the city) and at last being invironed with their enemies, towards evening yeelded, and offered themselves to be slain. And the Romanes might have boasted that that victory had been without blood-shed on their part, had not Antonius a Centurion been slain treacherously. For one of them who fled into the caves (as many did) requested Antonius to give him his hand, in token that he might come out safe and without danger: which he doing unadvisedly, straightway the Jew with a spear smote him in the flank, whereof he presently died. The Romanes that day slew all the people that they found, and the daies following they searcht all the secret places, and drew those out of the caves and dens that had fled thither, and slew all but women and infants: so that they took away 1000. and 200. captives: and the number of them who were slain during the siege, and at such time as the city was taken, amounted to 40000. And Vespasian commanded the city to be destroyed, and the castles to be burnt, and so Jotapata was taken the 13. yeer of Nero's reign, on the first of July.

How JOSEPH was taken, and how he redeemed his life with deeds and words.

BUT especially above all others, the Romanes made diligent search for Ioseph, both for the hatred they bare him, and also because Vespasian greatly desired to get him, for that he being taken, the greatest part of the wars were then ended; so they sought him among the dead, and amongst those that were hid: but he (fortune favouring him) when the city was taken, escaped from the midst of his enemies, and leapt into a deep Well, which had a large cave on the one side, the which they above could not perceive; where he found fourty principall men who had provision for many daies. The enemies being in every place, he in the day time lay hid, and in the night he went forth to see if he could escape: and perceiving that all places about were diligently watcht for to take him, he returned again into the cave, and lay there two daies: the third day a certain woman that had been with them in the cave was taken, and so he was descri'd. Then Vespasian sent two Tribunes to him to promise him safety, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanus: But Ioseph would not accept their offer, fearing that because he had been the author of all the evils that the Romanes had endured, that therefore they sought him out to punish him: till Vespasian sent unto Ioseph, Nicanor, the third Tribune, one of Iosephs acquaintance. Nicanor recounted unto him how milde the Romanes were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Roman Captaines rather admired him for his vertue, then hated him. Moreover, that his Generall intended not to punish him (which if he pleased, he might do whether he yeelde himself or no) but to save him, who was so valiant a man: adding also, that if Vespasian meant ill, he would never have imployed his friend in such a message, to use friendship (so noble a vertue) to so evill a purpose as to work treason: and that he, though Vespasian had been so minded, would never have consented to have betrayed his friend. Ioseph, after Nicanors words, began to studie, as doubtful what best to do. Whereat the souldiers being angry, began to cast fire into the cave: but Vespasian hindred them, being desirous to take Ioseph alive. Nicanor ceased not to intreat him: and he perceiving how his enemies began to wax angry, and calling to minde the dreames he had in the night, wherein God foretold him of all the Jews calamities, and what should betide the Roman Princes (for he could interpret dreames, and whatsoever God obscurely shewed, being instructed in the holy books of the Prophets, & himself a Priest as his parents were.) So at that time being as it were filled with the Spirit of God, and recording the dreames and horrible visions which he saw in his sleep, he prayed secretly to God after this manner, O Creator (quoth he) seeing that it pleaseth thee to ruinate the nation of the Jews, and that all good fortune is gone unto the Romanes, and that thou hast chosen my soule to foretell future events, I yeeld unto the Romanes to save my life, protesting that I mean not to goe to them to play the traytor unto my countrey, but as thy minister; and having A having thus spoken, he yeelded himselfe unto Nicanor. But they, who fled into the cave where Ioseph was, perceiving that Ioseph yeelded unto the Romanes, flocked all about him, and cried out, How are our countrey laws violated? Where are those promises of God made to the Jews? where are those gallant mindes that contemn and despise death? Art thou O Ioseph desirous to live, and see thy self to become a vile bondslave? How soon hast thou forgotten thy self? How many hast thou perswaded to embrace death for their libertie sake? Truly thou hast but a shadow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou dost hope that they will save thy life against whom thou hast so behaved thy self: or if they would save thee, to desire life at their hands. But seeing the Romanes offer hath made thee forget thy self; yet we, to preserve the honour and credit of our countrey, will lend thee our arms and swords, and so if thou be willing to die, die like the Generall of the Jews: which if thou refuse to do, thou shalt whether thou wilt or no die like a traytor to thy countrey. When they had thus said, they all threatned to kill him with their swords, if he did yeeld to the Romanes. Ioseph feared their violence, and perswaded himself, if he died before he had put them in minde of Gods Commandements, that then he should die a traytor to God: wherefore he began to make a Philosophicall discourse unto them concerning this present estate, what was to be done.

Wherefore (O my friends, quoth he) are we become murderers of our selves? Wherefore do we make war between things so united, as are the soule and the body? Will any man say that my minde is changed? Why, the Romanes know that it is a thing most honourable to die in warres, not any way, but according to the law of arms, to wit, by the conquerers hand. If I intreat the Romanes to spare my life, then am I worthy to perish with mine own sword and hand: but if they think good to spare their enemies, should not we think it good likewise to spare our own selves? Truly it is meer folly to do that to our own selves, for the which we fight against them. I confesse it is a commendable thing to die for ones libertie; but yet to die in fight, and by their hands who took away that libertie: but now neither do they warre against us, nor kill us. He is not onely to be judged a coward, who refuseth to die when need requireth, but also he who will die when no need urgeth. Moreover, what with-holdeth us from offering our selves to the Romanes? Truly, fear of death. Shall we therefore make that certain our selves, which we fear at the Romans hands? But some will say, How if not? then we are made captives: consider what libertie we now have. You will say it is the part of him that is valiant to kill himself: nay truly, it is the part of a very coward. For I think him to be a timorous seaman, who perceiving a tempest coming, before it fall, sinketh the ship wherein he is. Moreover, it is against the law of nature, and the nature of all creatures to kill themselves, and thereby we should commit a hainous crime against God. There is no living creature that of his own seeking would willingly die: for every one feeleth in himself the strong and forcible law of Nature, whereby they desire to live: and for this cause we judge them for our enemies, that seek to take it from us, and punish them that do take it indeed. And do you think it is not a greater contempt of God for a man to despise his gift? For we of him receive our first being, and from him let us expect our ending. The body is mortall, framed of corruptible matter; but our souls are immortall, and there is a little part of God, placed in our bodies. If any one abuse that which another man putteth him in trust with, presently we think him a perfidious and wicked man: and shall we think that if we cast away out of our bodies that which God hath put us in trust withall, and placed in the same, that he shall not know of it, whom we have so abused? We hold those slaves worthy to be punished that run away from bad masters: and shall not we then be held for impious, who flee from so good a master as God is? Do ye not know that they, who according to the law of nature depart out of this life, and render that to God which they received of him, when he who gave it requires it, shall leave behinde them a perpetuall name to their posteritie and family? And that unto those soules who are obedient to their Creator when he calls them, he gives a holy and sacred mansion in heaven, and from thence after a revolution of the heavens, departing, are again commanded to dwell in chaste bodies? And that they who have wrought their own death, go unto dark hell? & that God punisheth this their offence upon their all posteritie? Hence it is that God is displeased therewith, and it is forbidden by our most wise Lawmaker. For if any amongst us kill themselves, it is decreed that till the sunne go down they shall be unburied, yet we hold it lawfull to bury our enemies. Other nations cause their right hands to be cut off, who have kild themselves; judging that as the soule thereby was made a stranger to the bodie, even so by that fact was the hand made a stranger unto it. Wherefore, O companions, think on that which is decent, and not to adde to our humane misery impiety against God who created us. If we desire to be saved, let us save our selves: for it is no dish

F again commanded to dwell in chaste bodies? And that they who have wrought their own death, go unto dark hell? & that God punisheth this their offence upon their all posteritie? Hence it is that God is displeased therewith, and it is forbidden by our most wise Lawmaker, For if any amongst us kill themselves, it is decreed that till the sunne go down they shall be unburied, yet we hold it lawfull to bury our enemies. Other nations cause their right hands to be cut off, who have kild themselves; judging that as the soule thereby was made a stranger to the bodie, even so by that fact was the hand made a stranger unto it. Wherefore, O companions, think on that which is decent, and not to adde to our humane misery impiety against God who created us. If we desire to be saved, let us save our selves: for it is no disgrace to receive our lives at their hands who are witnesses of so many valiant deeds of ours. If we desire to die, let us die by their hands who have overcome us. I will not go into my enemies campe to be a traytor against my self. For I bear not their minde who forsake their own company to flee to their enemies: for they flee unto them to save their lives, but I go unto them to work mine own death, even the death of my self. And I would to God that the Romanes would break promise with me; for if they kill me after they have promised to save my life, I shall willingly die, and with great courage, having their breach of promise and perjurie for a comfort of the last victory.

Joseph spake much to this effect, to dissuade his companions from killing themselves. But they stopping their ears with desperation, wherewith they had armed themselves to die, came furiously towards him with their swords drawn, upbraiding him that he was a coward, and every one was ready to strike him. Then Joseph calling one by his name, & looking upon another with a countenance like a Governor, holding anothers hand, and intreating the rest (distracted in such danger) at last escaped from being killed at that instant: for still as one came neer him to strike him, he turned his face upon him like some cruell beast; and some of them who remembred how he had been their Captain in their extremitie, with reverence of his personage trembled, so that their swords fell out of their hands: and many lifting up their arms to strike him, of their own accord let their weapons fall. Joseph, notwithstanding his desperate estate, yet was he not void of counsell, but assisted by Gods providence, he hazarded his life, and spake unto them as followeth: Seeing (quoth he) that ye are all determined to die, let us cast lots who shall kill one another; and he, to whom the lot falleth, shall be kild by him who next ensueth, and so the lot shall be cast upon every one of us, so that none of us shall be forced to kill our selves. For it were injustice, that when some of us be slain, the rest should repent themselves, and so escape. They all liked well of this, and alwaies he upon whom the lot fell, was slain by him that followed; as though they were now to die with their Captain: for death was more acceptable, because they thought Joseph should die with them. Now it hapned by the providence of God, that Joseph remained alive onely with one other, and then perswaded him who was left alive, to live and not seek death, for fear the lot should fall upon himself: and for that if he survived, he should be polluted with the murder and slaughter of his own nation. Thus Joseph, delivered both from the wars of the Romanes, and also of his own nation, went with Nicanor unto Vespasian.

All the Romanes came about him to see him: and pressing about their Generall, they made a great noise, some rejoycing that he was taken, others crying out to punish him, others striving to come neer to behold him better: and they who were a far off, cried out to kill their enemy: but those who were neer him and beheld him, remembring his prowess, were astonished to see that change. And there was no Captain nor Ruler, but although before they were all moved against him, yet now beholding him, they all began to pity him: and especially Titus, who being of a gentle disposition, admired Josephs valour, his constancy in adversity, and his age, and thereby was moved to take compassion upon him, remembring what a manner of man he had been during the wars, and what he now was being fallen into his enemies hands: calling also to minde the force and power of fortune, and how small a stay the chance of wars had, and that no humane affairs had any stay or hold in them, wherefore he drew many mens mindes to pity him, so that Titus was the chief author of Josephs life: yet Vespasian caused him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to send him to Caesar. Which Joseph hearing, requested that he might speak a word or two with him alone. Then all but his sonne Titus departing and two of his friends, Thou O Vespasian (quoth he) thinkest onely that thou hast Joseph for thy captive, but I am a messenger unto thee of great matters from God, otherwise I knew my countrey laws, and how it behoved the Generals of our nation to die; and not to be taken alive by their enemies. Wilt thou send me to Nero? Wherefore? As though Nero should live still, and thou not succeed him? Thou, O Vespasian art Caesar, and the Emperour of Rome, and Titus also thy son; and keep me in bonds with thee, for thou art not onely my Lord, but Lord of all the world, and sea, and land, and all mankind. And if I now sain these things in this estate that I am, of mine own mind against God, let me be reserved unto a greater punishment. After he had thus spoken, Vespasian gave small credit to his words, and onely thought that Joseph fained these things of himself to save his life: yet by little and little he began to give credit unto him, because God put it in his minde to hope for the Empire: and foretelling his reign by many signes and tokens, he also found Joseph to tell the truth in other matters. For one of Vespasians friends answered, that it was marvell that he knowing that, could not prophecy of the event of the wars against Jotapata, & what was like A to befall himself, that he might have avoided those evils. Ioseph answered, that he foretold the citizens of Jotapata, that after seven and forty dayes they should be destroyed, and that the Romanes should keep him alive in hold. Vespasian secretly enquired of these matters, and finding by the relation of the captives that it was true, he began to give more credit to that which Ioseph had told him concerning himself. So he commanded Ioseph to be kept prisoner, yet did he give him apparel and divers other things in most kinde manner: and Titus did greatly honour him. The fourth day of July Vespasian returned unto Ptolemais, and from thence he came into the sea-coast unto Casarea, which is the greatest Citie of Judæa, whose inhabitants are for the most part Greeks: so the inhabitants received the army and the Generall with all friendship possible, both for that they loved the Romanes, as especially also for that they hated them who were destroyed; so that many intreated Vespasian to put Ioseph to death. But Vespasian, judging this a rash petition, would make no answer unto it: and he left two legions to winter at Casarea, because he saw it was a fit place, and sent the tenth and fifth unto Scythopolis, because he would not over-charge Casarea with the whole army. This place is warme in winter, and exceeding hot in summer, by reason it is situate on a Plain by the sea-coast.

C IN the mean time, a great multitude being gathered together, who either were seditious persons, or thieves, or such as had escaped out of the ruined cities, began to reedifie Joppe for their refuge, which Cestius beforetime had destroyed: and seeing that they could not rob nor spoile the countrey which was already wasted, and left desolate by wars, they purposed to become Pirates: and so building ships for that purpose, they robbed the Phoenicians, Syrians and Egyptians, not suffering any to passe those seas without danger. Vespasian understanding their intent, sent horsemen and footmen thither: who finding the Citie not guarded, got into it in the night time: which the inhabitants perceiving were so afraid, that they durst not make any resistance to expell the Romanes, but they all retired themselves unto their ships, and there staid all night, a flight-shot from the shoare. Joppe is naturally no road for ships (for it is situated upon a turbulent shoare) and on every side hath very high and eminent rocks, which trouble the seas, and make huge waves: in this place (if we may beleieve the fable) one may see the signes of Andromedaes chains. When the North winde blows, it striketh the waves against the rocks, and so causeth a dangerous sea, that it were far more safe to be in the midst of the seas, then at that shoare when the same winde bloweth. The inhabitants of Joppe rode there all night, and by break of day the North winde began to blow fiercely, and drave some of the ships one against another, and others against the rocks: and many striving against winde and weather, and seeking to get into the midst of the sea for fear of the rockie shoare, and their enemies there, were drowned; and they that escaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of safety; for the tempest did drive them from the sea, and the Romanes from the city, so that the ayre was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noyse and sound of the ships beating one against another. So some of the inhabitants of Joppe were swallowed by the waves, others suffered shipwrack, some killed themselves rather then to be drowned: many with the waves were stricken against the rocks, so that the sea was bloody, and all the shoare was covered with dead bodies: and whosoever escaped the sea and got to shoare, the Romane souldiers there ready standing, killed them. There were foure thousand and two hundred dead bodies cast upon the shoare. So the Romanes having without any fight taken the city, they destroyed it: and thus was Joppe taken, and wice destroyed by the Romanes in a short time. Vespasian builded there a Castle, and placed in it some few horsemen and footmen, to the end that none of the Jews should come thither again to play the Pirates, and that the footmen might keep the Castle, and in the mean time the horsemen might go forth, and spoile all the towns and villages, and territories belonging to Joppe: which also they did. When the news of the destruction of Jotapata was brought unto Jerusalem, many gave finall credit to it, partly for the greatnesse of that calamity, partly for that no one man could say, that he had seen the destruction of the city: for none escaped that massacre to bring news, but onely report thereof was spread abroad; but at the last it was verified to be true by those that dwelt neer unto that place, and then they beleaved it. Many things also which were false, were reported as true. It was likewise bruted, that Ioseph was slain in the destruction of the city, for whose death all Jerusalem sorrowed, and every one mourned for their lost kindred; all bewailed the supposed death of the Generall, and some of their sons, others of their brethren and kinsfolk, and others of their acquaintance. They all mourned for Ioseph thirty daies, and hired many musicians to sing funerall songs for him. At last, truth discovered it selfe, and the true news of the destruction of Jotapata with the accidents there: also how Ioseph was not slain, but lived with the Romanes, and that the Romanes honoured him with more then a captive could expect. Then the Jews began as much to hate him now living, as before they mourned for him when they supposed him dead. And some said he was a coward, others that he was a traitor unto his countrey, and the whole city breathed out reproachfull speeches against him. These heavy tydings increased their rage, and this their adversitie (which unto wise men had been a warning to provide lest the like befell them) made them more outrageous; so that alwaies the end of one mischief was the beginning of another. To be short, now they were more incensed against the Romanes then before, as it were that they might also be revenged of Ioseph. And this was the estate of the citizens of Jerusalem.

Vespasian was desirous to see the kingdome of Agrippa (for the King had intreated him to go thither, partly to feast him and his whole army, partly to repress some troubles arising in his Kingdome, in the time of his absence) and so departed from Cæsarea upon the sea-coast, and went unto Cæsarea Philippi, where he staid, and refreshed his souldiers 20. daies, and himself also feasted, giving God thanks for his prosperous successe in the wars. This done, he had intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were revolted (both which cities belonged unto Agrippa his kingdome) and fully determining utterly to destroy the Jews which inhabited thereabouts, he thought it good to lead his army against these two places, especially that he might reward Agrippa for his good entertainment, by surrendering these cities unto him. Wherefore he sent his son Titus to Cæsarea to bring the souldiers there unto Scythopolis, which was the greatest of all the ten cities, which also is neer unto Tiberias; whither himself being come, he expected his sons coming: and departing from thence with three legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the seditious people of Tiberias might behold his army; this place was thirty furlongs from Tiberias: from thence he sent Valerianus the Decadarch to entreat a peace with them, and sent fifty horsemen to accompany him: for he understood that the people desired peace, and against their will were forced to war, by some of the seditious amongst them. Valerianus coming neer the City wals, lighted from his horse, commanding all his company to do the like, that they of Tiberias might not think that they came to fight, but in peaceable manner: but before he spake any one word, the boldest and strongest of the seditious persons came out armed against him, having one Iesus the sonne of Tobias, who had been a Captain of thieves, for their Governour and leader. Valerianus not presuming to fight without authoritie from his Generall, although he had been certain of the victory; again considering that it was great danger for so few to fight against a whole multitude, and withall terrified with the boldnesse of the Jews, contrary to his expectation, he fled on foot accompanied onely with five other, leaving his horse and the rest behinde him, whom Iesus and his followers took, and brought into the Citie, rejoycing as though they had taken them in fight, and not by treason. But the Senators and chief of the City, fearing what might ensue of this fact, went unto the Romanes, and together with King Agrippa came unto Vespasian, and prostrated themselves at his feet, beseeching him not to despise them, and not to think that the whole City were partakers with those few wicked persons, that so had merited his displeasure; requesting him to spare the people who alwaies had honoured the Romanes, but rather that he should punish the authors of that revolt and misdemeanour: who also had withheld the whole Citie, even untill now, to yeeld it self unto the Romanes, Vespasian moved by their entreaties, pardoned the City, though he was incited against them all for taking of Valerianus his horse; in that he perceived Agrippa was sorrowfull, for feare that the City should be destroyed, and so by them Vespasian promised the townes-men pardon. Then Iesus and his associates thinking it not safe for them to abide there, fled unto Tarichea. The next day, Vespasian sent before him Trajanus with certain horsemen into the Castle, to see if all the multitude desired peace: and finding the people to beare peaceable mindes, he with his whole army came unto the City. And the inhabitants opening the gates of their City, went to meet him

A him with great joy, all crying out that he was the authour of their welfare and benefactor, and wishing him all prosperitie and felicity. The gates of the City were narrow, so that the army could not quickly enter in: wherefore Vespasian commanded a part of the wall on the South side to be pulled down, and so entred in: yet did he not sack the Citie, nor ruine the wals, for Agrippa's sake, who promised that from thenceforth the citizens would be quiet. And so he pacified the Citie greatly troubled with sedition.

CHAP. XVII.

How Tarichea was besieged.

B VESPASIAN departed from Tiberias, and pitched his tents betwixt it and Tarichea, and encamped himselfe: foreseeing that there he should have some trouble and long abode: for all rebels that desired warre came thither, trusting both to the strength of the city, and the lake adjoyning unto it called Genesar. For this citie was situate like Tiberias, under the mountains: and Ioseph had enclosed it with a wall on every side, where it was not compassed by the lake. But the wall though it were strong, yet was it not so strong as that of Tiberias: for Ioseph builded that in the beginning of the rebellion, having men and money at will; but that of Tarichea was built onely by the remainder of his liberalitie. The Taricheans had great store of ships in the lake adjoyning, to the end that if they were overcome by land, they might flee by water: and therefore they had prepared their ships for battell by water if need should be. Whilest the Romanes entrenched themselves, Iesus & his followers not dismaied either with the multitude or militarie discipline of his enemies, issued out of the city, and slew the workmen, and destroyed a part of the work: and perceiving the Romanes armed and assembled together against him, he fled again unto his company without any losse or harme received. But the Romanes pursued them so fast, that they forced them to take their ships: and so being gone as farre from the shore, as that yet they might easily reach them with the shot of an arrow, they cast anchor and disposed their ships in warlike manner, and fought against the Romanes who were on shore. Vespasian understood that a great multitude of them were gathered together in a place neer unto the city: wherefore he sent his sonne Titus against them with 600. horsemen, who finding the number of his enemies to be infinite, certified his father, that he needed more forces: and perceiving many of those horsemen of good courage, before any more aide came, and yet that some of them were afraid of the Jews, he stood in a high place where all might heare him, and said, O ye Romanes, I will first put you in minde who you are and of what nation, that so you considering what your selves are, may also consider who they are with whom we are to fight; never yet was there any enemy in any part of the world that could escape our hands. The Jews themselves though already overcome, yet doe they endure and manfully bear out their misery: if therefore they constantly endure warres, and fight valiantly being in adversitie; what should we do who are in prosperitie? I rejoyce to see you shew good countenance, yet I fear lest so huge a multitude of our enemies discourage some of you: let every one therefore once again consider, who himself is, and with whom he is to fight: and that although the Jews be bold and valiant enough, yet they observe no warlike order, and are unarmed, and so are more fitly teamed a multitude then an army. I need not speak of your knowledge and skill in warres: nay for this onely cause are we trained up in warlike discipline in the time of peace, to the end that our number should answer to the number of our enemies when we are to joyn battell: for what fruit shall we shew of this our perpetuall warlike order and discipline, if we dare onely fight with a rude multitude that are no more in number then our selves? I think that you being armed are to fight with unarmed, and being horsemen are to fight with footmen, and being guided by the advice of a Captain, with them who have no head nor ruler: and that these things considered, do supply in us the want of more men, and the contrary in our enemies doth as it were diminish their number. Victory doth not onely consist in the multitude of men, be they never so warlike, but also in a few, if they be valiant: for as they are few, so are they easily guided, and may easily come to help one another, not being pestered; whereas huge multitudes do more hinder one another then do good, and do themselves more harme then their enemies. So the Jews are led with desperation, rage and fury, which indeed in prosperous successe are of some force, but in a desperate fortune they are quickly daunted: but we are led by vertue and obedience and fortitude, which both are of force in prosperitie, and also are good in adversitie. Moreover, we have greater occasion to fight then the Jews have: for they fight onely for their countrey and libertie, but we fight for renown and Empire; that that we have already gained the Empire of the whole world, it might not be thought that our enemies the Jews were adversaries able to match us. Consider moreover, that ye need not fear any great danger, for we have many to help us, and that hard by: let us therefore atchieve the victory before any more succour come unto us; so shall our credit be greater, and our victory more famous. I verily think that now triall is made of me, my father, and you; to discern if he be my father, I his sonne, and you my souldiers: for he is wont to be victorious, and shall I return unto him being conquered? and are you not ashamed to be dismaied, seeing that I your Captain will offer my self and undergo the greatest perils? My self will bear the brunt of the enemies, and first encounter with them, and let none of you depart from me: perswade your selves that God will assist my force, and boldly presume that we can do much more being in the midst of our enemies, then if we should onely fight with-

Titus having thus spoken, as it were by Gods providence, all his souldiers took heart and courage, so that now they were sorry to see Trajanus come with 400. horsemen more before the fight was begun, as though their victory should be lesse renowned, because he came to help them. Vespasian also sent Antoninus and Silo with 2000. archers, to take the mountain that was just opposite unto the town, and to beate them that defended the City, off from the wals: and they did as they were commanded. Then Titus with all force possible, rushed with his horse upon the enemies: and all followed him with an huge cry, scattering themselves in such order as they occupied as much ground as the Jews, and so appeared more then they were. The Jews though terrified by their discipline, yet they withstood the first assault: but in the end dismaied, and put out of order with their lances, and killed with the horsemen, every one fled as fast as he could into the City. And Titus killed some as they fled, others as he met them, and those he overtook, and many one for haste tumbling one upon another, and he prevented all that fled unto the wals, and drave them back again into the field, till at last the multitude prevailed, and so they got into the City. Now at their return into the City, there befell a great dissention: for the inhabitants considering their own estate, and the event of all former warres, and especially of this last fight, mistaked of warre, and desired peace: but the strangers that had fled from other places thither, and were in great multitudes, would needs contend therein; and so one part began a mutiny against the other, as though they would presently one have taken arms against the other. Titus being not farre from the wall, heard these tumults within the Citie, and cried out unto the Romanes, This is the houre (fellow souldiers) wherein God hath given the Jews into our hands: why doe we deferre the time any longer? why do we not take the victory offered? do you not heare the cries within? they who escaped our hands, are at variance amongst themselves: the city is ours, if we make haste; and making haste, take courage: for nothing worth renown can be atchieved without danger: and let us not onely prevent our enemies concord which necessitie will soon effect, but also our own forces before any fresh aide come unto us; that besides the victory we have, being so few over so huge a multitude, we may also divide the spoile of the city among us. No sooner had he thus spoken, but presently he mounted upon his horse, and rode into the lake, and so passed into the City, and all the souldiers followed him. They that defended the wals, were amazed at his boldnesse, so that none made resistance against him as he came: but Jesus with his followers leaving his quarter which was his to defend, fled into the fields, others flying towards the lake, fell into their enemies hands, who came that way against him, and so were massacred even as they were getting into their ships: other some were slain as they did swim to overtake the ships that were new lancht from the shore; and there was a great slaughter of men all over the City. For the strangers that fled not, made resistance, and the townes-men did not offer to defend themselves; for they abstained from fight, hoping for pardon in that they were not against those proceedings: till at last Titus having slain the wicked, took compassion upon the townes-men and saved their lives, and caused the slaughter to cease. They who fled into the lake, seeing the City even taken, ran away as farre as they could from their enemies. Titus sent horsemen to let his father understand what he had done. Whereof he having intelligence, being very glad for his sonnes valour and magnanimitie, and for the atchieving of such a victory, whereby a great part of those warres was ended, he commanded the Citie to be guarded presently round about, to the intent that none might escape away alive. And the next day he came down unto the lake, and commanded ships to be built to pursue those that had escaped by it: and having many workmen and great store of matter to build them withall, his command was presently effected.

*Of the lake of Genezar, and the fountain of Jordan.*The year of the world, 4031.
Nativity, 69.

THe lake of Genezar taketh his name from the countrey adjoyning unto it, the breadth thereof is fourty furlongs, the length a hundreth. The water of this lake is sweet and good to drink, and is more subtil then ordinarily pure water of marish places are, and it is very cleere neer the shoare, and more temperate to drink, then either that of the river or fountain, but it is alwaies more cold then one would judge such a lake to be of that largenesse: for the water being set in the Sun, doth not lose his coldnesse: which the inhabitants have used to doe in summer evenings to allay the naturall coldnesse thereof. There are here many sorts of fishes nothing like to fishes of other places, either in shape or taste. The river Jordan passeth thorow the midst of it. It is thought that Panium is the head and fountain of Jordan, but in truth it hath his originall from Phiala, and from thence passeth under the ground: this place is a hundreth and thirty furlongs from Casarea, towards that way which leads unto Trachon on the right hand. This water is called Phiala, by reason of his roundnesse: for it is as round as a wheele, and the water still keepeth within the brink of Phiala, never increasing nor diminishing; and no man knew that this was the head of Jordan, till Philip the Tetrarch of Trachon found it to be so: for he casting straws into Phiala, found them afterward carried unto Panium, which before that time was thought to be the fountain of Jordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa his cost and charges it was much more adorned. Jordan beginneth with a deep river out of this denne, and passeth along the marish places, and durty lake of Semechonitis, & from thence 120. furlongs unto the city of Julia, and in the way divideth the lake Genezar, and passing a great way further into the wilderness, at last it endeth in the lake called Asphaltites. Upon the lake Genezar there bordereth a countrey of the same name, naturally beautifull and admirable: for there is no kinde of plant which groweth not there, and the inhabitants have replenished it with plants and trees of all sorts, and the temperature of the aire well agreeth with so divers trees; for there are an infinite company of Nut-trees, which of all trees especially require a cold soile: there are also abundance of Palmes, which desire great heat: likewise great store of figs and olives, which require a temperate aire: so that one may justly say, that through the bounty of nature, so different and opposite qualities are here in one united; and at one time, as it were, all difference of seasons of the yeer conjoynd for good purpose. And it doth not onely nourish these fruits, but also conserveth them for ten whole moneths: there grow figs and grapes, which two one may well call the kings of fruits; all other fruits continue all the yeer long. For beside the temperature of the aire, it is also watered by a fertile fountain called Capernaum: many think it to be an arme of Nilus, because it hath fishes like a Corbe bred in a lake neer Alexandria. The length of this countrey along the lake bearing the same name, is thirty furlongs, and the breadth twenty. And this is the name of the lake Genezar, and the countrey about it.

How the Taricheans were destroyed.

Vespasian having finished his ships, and furnished them with as many men as he thought sufficed against them whom he was to pursue, he embarked upon the lake, and himselfe also went against them. The Taricheans could not possibly make any escape by land, although they would, and were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romans, for their smal pyrat. boats were not able to withstand their enemies great vessells; and beside that, they were not sufficiently manned, so that they feared to encounter with the Romanes who pressed altogether upon them: yet notwithstanding sometime they came about the Romanes ships, and cast stones at the Romanes afar off, and sometime also came neer, and skirmished with them: yet they themselves alwaies had more harme then the Romanes, for their stones which they cast did onely rattle against the Romanes armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romanes arrows: and if at any time they were so bold as to come neer the Romanes, they were slain before that they could do them any harme, or else drowned with their boats. And as many as attempted to wound the Romans, were slain with Javelins, and other with swords, the Romans leaping into their boats; and many were taken with their boats, the ships meeting one another. They that were in the water and did lift up their heads to swim, were prevented with arrows, or overtaken with Romane boats: and if in desperation they came swimming towards their enemies, their hands or heads were presently cut off. And thus some perished one way, some another, till at last they fled, and arrived upon the shore, their ships being compassed round about. So the Romanes kild many upon the lake, and many upon the land, and one might then have seen all the lake stained with blood full of dead bodies, for not one escaped alive. A few daies after in that countrey there was a very odious stinch, and a horrible spectacle: for the shores were all full of boats that had suffered shipwrack, & dead bodies swollen in the water: and those dead bodies taking heat, did putrifie and so corrupt the aire all about, that not onely the whole countrey and inhabitants thought it a miserable affliction, but also the Romans who were the authors thereof. And this was the end of that warre by water. And the number of them that were slain here in the city, was 6500. The fight being ended, Vespasian sate in a tribunall seate, and separated the strangers from the inhabitants, for that they seemed to be the authors of that warre: yet he deliberated with the Captains and Governours, whether he should likewise pardon them: but they told him that their lives might endamage him; for said they, if thou send those men away and let them live, they cannot live peaceably, because they want abiding places, and are able to disturbe and disquiet those to whom they shall flie. Vespasian for this cause judged them unworthy to live, assuredly knowing that if they were let go, they would fight against them who pardoned their lives, yet he deliberated what death to put them to. But he thought with himself the inhabitants would not patiently abide so many to be massacred, who had fled unto them for succour: wherefore he sought to use no violence unto them, because he had promised them securitie. But at last he was overcome by the perswasion of his friends, who told him that all things against the Jews were lawfull, and that profit was to be preferred before honesty, seeing both could not be had: so licence being granted unto them to depart, they suspecting nothing, were commanded to take onely that way that leadeth unto Tiberias: and they fearing nothing, willingly obeyed that which was commanded them, not misdoubting the safetie of their goods or money: but the Romanes had placed themselves on every side the way even unto Tiberias, to the intent that none might escape, and so shut them all in the city. Presently after came Vespasian and inclosed them all in an Amphitheater, and so killed 1200. of them, who were all old men or young, and unable for service: of the rest that were all strong young men, he sent 6000. unto Nero at Isthmos neer Corinth. The rest of the multitude he sold, in number 30400. beside others that he gave unto Agrippa: for he permitted him to do what he would with those sort that were of his kingdome: But Agrippa sold also those that were given him. The rest of them were fugitives and seditious persons of Trachon, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whose contempt of peace justly procured these wars. They were taken the sixt of the Ides of September.

After that Tarichea was conquered, all those that from the time that Jotapata was surpris'd till this instant, had revolted from the Romanes, did now again unite themselves unto them: so that the Romanes had now gotten into their hands all Castles and Towns, Giscala onely excepted, and Itaburium, a mountain so called. With these two rebelled Gamala, a town over against Tarichea, and situate upon the lake, belonging to the kingdom of Agrippa, and also Sogane and Seleucia: and these two last were both belonging to Gaulanitis, and Sogane appertained to the higher part called Gaulana, and Gamala unto the lower, Seleucia unto the lake Semechonitis, which is thirrie furlongs in breadth, and threescore large, whose marshes reach even unto Daphne, which countrey is very pleasant of it self, and famous for that it entertaineth the stream called little Jordan, and at the foot of the golden mountain doth drive it into the great Jordan. Agrippa, in the beginning of the rebellion, united Sogane and Seleucia unto himself: but Gamala, by reason of the situation apt to resist, did not yeeld unto him, for it is farre stronger then Jotapata. For, from an exceeding high mountain, there descendeth a hill very difficult for any to passe, rising high in the midst, and then descendeth lower and lower both before and behinde, so that it representeth the figure of a Camell, which the Hebrews call Gamal, and so thereof it took the name, though the inhabitants do not keep the exact signification. Before it, and on either side are deep valleys, into the which a man can hardly descend, onely it may be taken and assaulted on that side where it joyneth unto the mountain, which also the inhabitants have made inaccessible, by cutting out there a deep ditch. In that place the City was very well inhabited on the descent of the hill, and towards the South part it stood on so steep a hill, that it seemed as if it would have falne every hour, and the South hill served the inhabitants in stead of a Castle, being unwall'd: for it was an exceeding high rock, and reached down even to the bottom of the valley in the town, and at the walls thereof there was a fountain. Although this Citie were of his own nature invincible, yet Joseph compassing it with a wall, and with ditches and mines, made it stronger. Wherefore the inhabitants of this place put farre more confidence in their walls then they of Jotapata did: yet were they fewer in number, and not so warlike people as they; but for the situation of the Citie, they esteemed themselves more then their enemies: for the citie was full of men that fled thither by reason of the strength of the place: so that for seven moneths they resisted them that were sent by Agrippa to besiege them. Vespasian departed from Ammaus, and pitched his tents before Tiberias, and so went unto Gamala, (Ammaus is interpreted hot waters, for there is a fountain of hot water which cureth many diseases) and the Citie was so situate, that he could not besiege it round about: wherefore he placed men to keep watch in such places as it was passable, and obtained the highest mountain, where his souldiers pitching their tents, lastly entrenched themselves. On the East part of the citie in the most eminent place there was a castle, where the fifteenth and fifth legions laboured against the town; and the tenth legion filled up the ditches and valleys. King Agrippa went unto the walls, and spake unto them that defended them, willing them to yeeld to the Romanes: but one of them with a sling strook him on the right arm, and hurt him, and his familiar friends came about him to defend him. Then the Romanes, for anger that the King was hurt, and for fear of such mischances to themselves, now became earnest to assault the town, perswading themselves that they would use strangers and their enemies hardly, if it lay in their lot, seeing they had so evill intreated one of their own nation, for perswading them unto what was profitable for them.

trumpets and a great noise, and cries, and fought with the townsmen, who in the first conflict so valiantly resisted them, that they permitted them not to enter any further into the town. At last being overcome both in strength and number, they all fled into the highest part of the city, and from thence they turned again upon the Romanes, who pursued them, and drave them down into the valleys, and killed many, and divers in that straight passage were trodden to death by their fellows. The Romanes, seeing that they neither could flee, nor resist their enemies above their heads, fled into their houses, which adjoynd unto the Plain, and so filled them, that being overcharged, they fell down, and lighted upon other houses beneath them, which did bear them down also, and they likewise others situated beneath them. Many of the Romanes this way perished, for being amazed, and not knowing what to do, they fled into their houses, notwithstanding they did see them shake and totter: and many seeking to escape, were maymed by some part of the ruins that fell upon their bodies, and many were choaked in the dust. The citizens of Gamala rejoiced thereat, thinking that this aid was sent from God: and not regarding their private commodities, they ceased not to compell the Romanes into their houses, and if any were in the narrow streets, them they slew with darts from above out of the high places. Thus the ruins afforded them stones enough, and their slain enemies swords and armor, which they took from them, being now half dead, and used them against themselves: many died, who cast themselves headlong from off the houses being ready to fall, and those that sought to flee could not easily escape, for being ignorant of the wayes, and there being such a dust that one could not see another, one of them killed another: and so with much ado finding passage, they went out of the citie.

Vespasian, who was alwayes among the midst of these hurly burlies, was greatly moved to see the buildings fall so upon his souldiers: and forgetting his own safetie, he secretly retired himself with onely a few into the higher part of the citie, where he was left in great danger, having very few about him (for Titus his sonne was not there, being before this time sent unto Mutianus in Syria) and now he could not flee safely, nor yet had it been for his honour, if he could. Wherefore remembering all that he had done even from his child-hood, and his own vertue, he encouraged his men, and with them joynd arms, and covered themselves with their shields, and so as it were moved with some divine motion, defended themselves from all darts, arrows and stones, which were cast from aloft upon them, and so remained there, not terrified either by the number or might of his enemies, till at last, they wondering at his divine vertue and courage, asswaged their furie. And now perceiving his enemies to assault him but faintly, he retired back, till at such time as he got without the Citie walls.

Many Romanes perished in that fight, and amongst the rest, Ebutius a Decadarch, who not onely in that fight, shewed himself valiant, but also in many warres before, and had done the Jews much harm. Also in that fight a certain Centurion, named Gallus, accompanied with ten souldiers, hid himself in a house, and at supper time he heard the people of that house talk, what the citizens of Gamala were purposed to do against the Romanes (this Gallus and they with him were Syrians) and in the night time he slew them all, and after escaped safe unto the Romanes. Vespasian perceived all his army sorrowfull for that mischance, and so much the more, for that they never as yet had so bad a breakfast, and especially, for that they had forsaken their Generall, and left him in danger and distresse: wherefore he thought it good to comfort them, nothing speaking concerning himself, lest he should seem to finde fault with some in the beginning of his speech. Wherefore he told them, that it behoved them patiently to abide that which was common to all men, affirming that there was no victory without bloodshed, and that fortune was mutable: and that he had already slain many thousand Jews, and now had payed a small bribe for his happy successe unto adverse fortune. And that as it did not become any but vain glorious people to boast in their prosperitie, so it behoved none but cowards to fear and tremble in adversitie: For, said he, fortune is very mutable both to the good and bad, and he is a valiant man that is not moved by adversitie: for he, having all his wits about him, can even in the midst of his troubles see where any fault is, and amend it. Yet (quoth he) this hath not befallen us through the weaknesse of our courage, or the valour and prowesse of the Jews, but the difficultie of the place was the cause that they should overcome us, and we be overcome. Wherefore one may well reprehend the too much rashnesse of your spirits: for when you saw your enemies flee into the higher places, you should then have held your hands, and not to have pursued them with so manifest danger to your selves, as every one might foresee in this pursuit, so you having gained the lower part of the Citie, you might in time have drawn them to a sure

A ro a sure and safe conflict: but you, being eager of the victory, did not respect your own safety. It is not the manner of the Romanes rashly and unadvisedly to fight, who are wont to do all things orderly and advisedly: for the other is fit for barbarous people, and as you see proper to the Jews. Wherefore, let us call our own vertues to minde, and rather be angry for this that hath hapned (and so incite our selves to revenge) then sorrowfull. And let every valiant souldier with his own hand comfort himself; so shall we both revenge the death of our friends, and be revenged of them by whom they were slain: and I my self (as also now I did) will expose my self to all dangers with you, and go first to fight, and come last from fight. With these and such like speeches he comforted his souldiers.

The Romanes souldiers do all things with discretion.

B The people of Gamala were of great courage, and much emboldened with their prosperous success, which notwithstanding did not happen through their valour: but presently perceiving that now all hope of pardon was taken away, and that there was no way to escape, they were very sorrowfull, and their hearts relented (for now victuals failed them) yet they omitted not to provide for their own safety wherein they could; for the most valiant among them kept the breach, and the rest, other strong places about the walles which were yet unbattered. The Romanes againe built mounts, and attempted to assault the Citie, and many of the Citizens fled by the vallies where no guard was, and by secret vaults underneath the ground; and they who for feare lest they should be taken remained in the Citie, perished for hunger: for all the victuals were reserved for them that fought. And they still continued in this calamitie.

D Dring this siege, Vespasian made another expedition against them that kept the mountain Itaburium, situate between the great field and Scythopolis, which is thirtie furlongs high, and inaccessible on the north side. In the very top of this mountain there is a Plain twentie furlongs over, enclosed with a wall; all which wall being of so huge a compasse, Ioseph had built in fourtie daies, they received all necessary provision from beneath, for they had onely rain water. Unto this place a huge multitude were gathered, and Vespasian sent Placidus against them with six hundred horsemen, who could no waies get upon the mountain: wherefore he exhorted many of them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon: likewise many of the Jews came down unto him, as it were to entrap him, and assault him at unawares. Placidus for the nonce gave them fair speeches, hoping to get them down into the Plain: so they, as though they would have obeyed him, followed him thither, meaning when they came there, suddenly to assault him: yet Placidus his device took place. For when the Jews assaulted him, he fained himself to flee, and the Jews having pursued him a great way from the mountain, he turned againe upon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, and killed some, and hindred the rest of the multitude from ascending the mountain: so the rest left Itaburium, and fled unto Jerusalem, and the inhabitants (now water failing them) yeelded to Placidus, and delivered the mountain unto him.

F Now the most presumptuous among the Gamaliens fled and hid themselves, and the weaker sort did perish through famine: yet the most courageous that were left among them, defended the wall til the twentie seven day of October. Upon which day, three souldiers of the fifteenth Legion, towards break of the day, undermined the highest tower in their quarter, and entred into it; those that kept it, neither perceiving them when they came in, nor when they went out, (for it was in the night time.) These souldiers being wary lest any noise should be made, removed five of the greatest stones, and presently leapt away, and incontinently the tower fell with a hideous noise, and with the fall killed those that kept it, and many that kept watch in those quarters fled, being sore afraid: and they who sought to escape the Romanes, were killed, amongst whom one Ioseph was strooken with a dart from a part of the wall that was false down, and there dyed. They who were within the city were terrified with the noise hereof, and ranne up and downe as though all the enemies were already entred into it. And Chares Iosephs companion, being sick, yeelded up the ghost, fear encreasing his disease, and helping to shorten his life. The Romanes, remembering the bad successe at the last assault, did not enter the Citie till the three and twentie day of the foresaid moneth.

Then Titus, as it were vexed at the misfortune of the Romanes in his absence, accompanied with 200. horsemen, and certain chosen footmen, entred the City, no man resisting him: and he being passed into the same, the watchmen then first perceiving it, cried, To arms. Those within the Citie fearing that Titus was entred, some took their children, some their wives, and fled into the Castle with pitifull cries and weeping: others met Titus, and were all put to the sword: and they that could not get into the Castle, not knowing what to do, fell among the Romane watchmen: then the skies were fild with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the city flowed with blood. Vespasian led his whole army against those that fled into the castle, which was of a huge height, and scarcely to be come unto, being all of stone, and full of ditches and deep dens, and compassed with steepy rockes: so the Jews did drive down the Romanes, that offered to come up unto them, partly with darts, partly with stones, which they rouled down upon them, and they were so high, that the Romanes arrows could not reach them. But at last, as it were by Gods providence, who would have it, a whirlwinde arose, which carried the Romanes arrows amongst them in the castle, and the Jews arrows from the Romanes, and the winde was so violent, that it was not possible for them to stand upon those high places; and so not being able to stand, nor to see those that came against them, the Romans ascended & took the castle, some resisting for their defence, others yeelding themselves. The Romanes now called to minde their fellows that perished in the first assault, and so became more cruell. Many despairing of their lives, cast their wives, their children, and themselves headlong down those high places, into the deep vallies underneath. So that the cruelty that the Romanes shewed against the people of Gamala, was not so great as that which they used against themselves: for there were onely four thousand that perisht by the Romanes sword; and the number of them who so cast themselves down, was found to be five thousand; and not one escaped, but two women that were sisters, and daughters to Philip, who was son to Joachimus, a worthy man, and Governor over all Agrippas army under him; and these two were saved onely, because at such time as the city was taken, they hid themselves: for they spared not infants, but many took them and cast them down from the castle. And thus was Gamala destroyed the 23. day of October, which began to rebell the 21. day of September.

CHAP. IIII.

How TITUS took Giscala.

NOW all the cities and strong places of Galilee were taken, Giscala onely excepted: the inhabitants whereof desired peace, for that they were husbandmen, and their riches consisted in the fruits of the earth, but there were many thieves in the city: to which vice also many of the Citizens were addicted. The people were incited to rebell by one John, a witch, and a deceitfull person, sonne to one Leuias; who was of strange manners, and bold to presume any thing, and wonderfully atchieving all he took in hand, and he was known to all men for one that desired warre to make himself mighty. This man was Ringleader of the seditious persons in Giscala: and for feare of them, the people, who perhaps otherwise would have sent Legates to the Romanes to request peace, were hindred and forced to stay, till the Romanes came to warre against them. Against these people Vespasian sent Titus, and with him a thousand horsemen, and the tenth legion toward Scythopolis: and he with the rest went to Cæsarea, to refresh them after their great labour, at the charge of the townes adjoining; judging it necessary to comfort their bodies, and encourage their mindes to sustain manfully the warres that were to ensue: for he foresaw that he should have much ado to win Jerusalem, both for that it was wont to be the Kings seat, and also because it was the chief and head City of all the nation. And his care in this point was so much the more encreast, for that he perceived many out of all parts fled thither, and that it was naturally strong, and also compassed with almost invincible walls: and beside this, the boldnesse and desperate courage of the inhabitants, who although that they had had no wals at all, yet had been scarcely to be conquered: and therefore he thought it necessary to comfort his souldiers before the fight, like champions who ought to enter the field and fight courageously.

Titus (coming on horseback unto Giscala) perceived that it might easily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the people should be destroyed by the Romanes (and now he was weary of blood-shed) he compassionating the well disposed people, which were

A were otherwise like to perish together with the wicked, attempted to take it by condition. Wherefore the wals being full of people, amongst whom were many of the seditions, he told them that he marvelled what help they had or expected; or by whose advice, all other cities being now taken, they alone would abide the last brunt of the Romane forces; especially when as they had already seen many towns, farre stronger then theirs, overthrown at the first assault: and contrariwise, those who had yeelded themselves to the Romanes, lived in peace, and peaceably enjoyed all that was theirs. Which offer (said he) I now also make unto you, and am not yet incensed against you, because that which you do is for your liberty: but if (quoth he) you do still persevere in this impossible course, my displeasure shall be kindled against you. And if so be they refused this kinde offer, they should presently perceive the Romane sword to be sharpened for their destruction, and incontinently should finde that their wals were but a mockery, and no wayes able to resist the Romane engines: where contrariwise, if they yeelded themselves, and trusted to the fideliry of the Romanes, they should be the most happy people of all Galilee. None of the townsmen were admitted to make answer, nor to come unto the wals: for the theeves were masters of them; & a guard was placed at every gate, lest any one should go forth to submit themselves, or any horsemen should be received into the city. Then Iohn made answer, that he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either perswade or compell the inhabitants to accept of them, yet he requested, that that day might be granted unto the Jews: for it was the seventh day, wherein it was not lawfull for them to entreat of peace, nor make warre. For as the Romanes knew, the Jews every seventh day ceast from all work: and which if they profaned, they who caused it to be so abused, though it were Titus himself, were as great offenders as they who were forced to it. Moreover, so short time could not prejudice the Romanes, to wit, one nights space: for nothing he could effect in that time to endamage them, except onely by fleeing out of the city (which Titus might prevent by placing a strong guard and watch in every place thereabout) and that he thought it a great priviledge to be suffered to keep the custome of his countrey, and that it was his part, who offered peace and safety to them that expected it, and also to keep their laws whose safety he granted. With these and such like speeches Iohn sought to delude Titus, being not so religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as carefull for his own safety: for he feared that the city would presently be taken, and he left alone, and so he determined in that night to flee, as the onely way to save his life. Truly God would have it so, that Iohn should then escape, to be the overthrow of Jerusalem, and that Titus should not onely grant him the time he requested to deliberate, but also that night should pitch his tents neer Cydassa, by the higher part of the town, which is the strongest village of all that are in the heart of the Tyrian soil, which the Galileans alwayes hated. In the night time Iohn perceiving no Romanes to keep watch about the town, having now opportunity, fled not onely with the armed men about him, but also with many of the chief of the citie, and whole families, whom he promised to conduct unto Jerusalem. But Iohn fearing captivitie, and carefull for his own safety, having carried them twenty furlongs out of the Citie, forsook them: who being so left desolate, began grievously to lament. For every one thought himself as neer his enemies, as he was farre from the City and his friends: and still every step, they thought their enemies at hand ready to take them, and ever they lookt back, as though their enemies heard the noise they made as they went, and so came against them; insomuch that many rushed forward on heaps, & many were killed in the way with the presse of them that followed; so that women and infants did perish miserably: or if they spake any thing, onely it was entreating their parents or their kinsfolk to stay for them. But Iohns exhortation took effect, wherein he cried unto them to save themselves, and hasten unto such a place, where they might be safe, and revenge themselves of the Romanes, for the outrages which they that remained behinde were like to endure: and so the multitude that fled, every one as he was able dispersed themselves. Titus early in the morning came unto the wals to know whether they accepted of his offer. Then the people set open the gates, and with their wives and children came to meet him, all crying that he was their safety, and worker of their welfare, and that he had delivered their city out of captivitie: also they certified him how Iohn was fled, and besought him to pardon them, and execute justice upon those malefactors that remained in the city. And at their request, he sent certain horsemen to pursue Iohn, but they could not take him, for before they came, he had gotten into Jerusalem: yet they slew almost two thousand of them that fled with him, and brought back again 3000. women and children. Titus was angry that he suffered Iohns deceit to escape unpunished: yet his anger was something appeased, for that he perceived Iohns purpose prevailed, in that so many of his company were slain, and so many brought back their captives:

Thus he peaceably entred the city, commanding the souldiers to break down a little piece of the wall, as it were to take possession of it, and so punish the seditious rather with threats then torments. For he thought that many were accused onely for private hatred, and so were in danger to suffer being innocent: & he thought it better to let the wicked live in fear, then with them to destroy the guiltlesse. Thinking moreover, that hereafter they would be more quiet, either for fear of punishment, or for shame of their former offence, for which they were pardoned: and that if any man suffered unworthily, he could not afterward complain. Then he placed there a garrison, both to repress the seditious, and also to confirm them that desired peace. And thus was Galilee conquered after it had much toiled the Romanes.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the destruction of Jerusalem.

Soon as John was entred into Jerusalem, all the people flocked about him and those that came with him, enquiring what calamity had befallen them without the citie. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to speak, by signes discovered their necessity: yet amidst these their miseries, they boasted that it was not the Romane power that forced them to flee, but that they of their own accord fled thither to warre against the Romanes in a safer place, then that from whence they fled, was; for none but unadvised and rash-headed men would fight for such a citie as Giscala & other places that were not able to resist, seeing that it behoved them all to reserve their vigor and strength to defend their Metropolitane City. They also signified unto them, how Giscala was taken by the Romanes, and that they departed in good sort away, though some reported that they fled. The people of Jerusalem hearing what these men reported, and how many were captives unto the Romanes, they fell into a great fear, as though that which they told did portend their ruin. But John, nothing ashamed in that he had so shamefully forsaken them of Giscala who fled with him, went first to one, and then to another, inciting them all to warre under a vain hope, alleading the weaknesse of the Romanes, and extolling their own puissance, deceiving the simple people, and perswading them, that though the Romanes sought to revenge, yet could they never enter the wals of Jerusalem, who had so much ado, and endured such affliction in entring the little burges and villages of Galilee, against whose wals they had broken all their engines. These words of his, incited many yong men to sedition: but all the wiser sort foresaw what was like to ensue, and even now mourned their lost city. And in this case were they of Jerusalem: yet before this sedition in the City, the countrey people began to be at discord among themselves. For Titus departed from Giscala unto Casarea, and Vespasian went from Casarea to Jamnia and Azotus, and took them both: and leaving there garrisons, he returned to Casarea, bringing with him a huge company of them who had yeilded unto him. All cities were at civill warres among themselves; so that when the Romanes did not war upon them, one part of the Jews in every city fought against the other, and there was a great dissention between those that desired peace, and the seditious people: and at first, this discord began onely in private houses, but in the end, every one joyning with them that were of their minde, they now began in companies to rebell openly. Thus every place was troubled with civill discord: and every where rash young men, who desired warres, prevailed against grave and wise old men, who foreseeing the calamitie like to ensue, desired peace. At first, the inhabitants one by one rob'd and spoiled what they could; but at last, in whole troupes they joyned together, and robbed openly, and wasted all the countrey about: and they in their robberies shewed such crueltie, that the harm and injury they did unto their own countrey men, was altogether equall to the miseries which befell them by means of the Romanes; and they, who by these miscreants were spoiled, wished rather to have fallen into the Romanes hands. But they who kept the city, either because they were loth to weary themselves, or else for that they hated the citizens or people, did nothing or very little succour them that fell into these thieves hands. At last the thieves assembled themselves together from all places, and joyning companies, they brake into Jerusalem. This city had no governor, and according to the custome of that countrey, received all that came thither that were their countrey men, and so much more willingly at that time, because they thought that they that came thither, came of good will to help them: which onely was afterward the cause that the city was destroyed, setting aside the civill dissention. For a great multitude of people unapt to fight being there, consumed the victuals that would have sufficed for the fighting men: and beside the wars, they brought upon it famine and civill dissention. Then other thieves came out of the fields thereabout, & joyning themselves with those that were within the city, omitted no kinde of villany: for not content to rob and spoil, they

A they also attempted to commit murders, not onely privily, or in the night upon meane men, but even in the day time they publicly set upon the chiefeft of the nobilitie. For first of all they took Antipas, who was borne of the blood royall, a man so eminent amongst them, that the publike treasure was committed to his charge and custody, and put him in prison: and after him they took Sepha a worthy man, and sonne to Raguel and Lavys, both of them of the Kings houshold, and after them all that seemed to beare any sway, or were in authority amongst the people. Great feare fell upon the Inhabitants, and every one provided to save himself, as though the citie were even now surprized by the enemies. But these people were not content thus to have imprisoned those potentates, neither did they think it safetie for themselves any longer to detaine such men alive: for many came daily unto them to visit them, and unto their houses, who were able to revenge their injuries: and moreover they feared that the people would make a head against them, being moved with their iniquitie. Wherefore they determined to kill them: and to effect their purpose, they sent one John a cruell murderer, who was the son of Dorcus: he accompanied with ten more all having swords went unto the prison, and slew as many as they found there. To excuse this cruell fact of theirs, they alleadged this, to wit, that all they who were slain in prison, had conference with the Romanes concerning the betraying of the Citie into their hands, and that for this cause they had slaine them, being traytors to their Countrey: they also boasted that this fact of theirs had preserved the Citie, and that therefore they had well deserved of it. The people was brought unto such slavery and terror, that the chusing of the high Priest was in their hands to elect whom they pleased: so much was their insolence increased. Thus they not respecting the families, out of which it was onely lawfull to chuse the high Priest, they now elected strangers and base persons to that sacred dignitie, and such as would be partakers of their villanies and impieties: for they who not deserving it, attained to such dignitie, were as it were bound unto their will in all things, by whom they were so exalted. They also devised many lies, to make those that were in authoritie one at variance with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied, who were able to resist their enterprizes, till that being now satisfied with the blood of the Citizens, they began to commit impietie against God himself, and with prophane and unpure feet to enter into the Sanctuary. Then the people was incited against them by Ananias his meanes, who was one of the Priests, and the most ancient and wisest of them all, who perhaps had saved the Citie, had he escaped the hands of these miscreants. But they used the Temple as a Castle and defence for themselves against the people, and made the Sanctuary a place for them to exercise tyrannie in. And that which increased the sorrow of the Citizens, was, that amidst these calamities, their religion was also contumeliously abused: for these theeves, to try of what strength and courage the people were, and their own forces, did elect by lot a high Priest contrary to their law: which as we have already said, requireth that the high Priest shall be chosen by succession. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient custome, alledding that in time past the high Priest was chosen by lot. But indeed this their fact was an abrogation of the most firme custome that was amongst the people, and was onely a device to get all government into their hands by establishing Magistrates at their pleasure.

D Then calling one of the holy tribes named Eniachim, they cast lots, & it so fell out that the lot fell upon one, whereby their iniquity was discovered. This man whose lot it was to be high Priest was named Phanes, who was the sonne of Samuel, a man not onely unworthy of that dignitie, but who had been so rudely brought up, that he never knew what the high Priest meant: this Phanes was borne in a village called Aphthasis. Him, against his will they fetcht out of the field, and as it had been in a stage-play they graced him with another mans person, and presently gave him instructions how he should behave himself, putting upon him the sacred attire of the high Priest, as though that so great impietie had been but a sport. The rest of the Priests, beholding a farre off the holy laws to be scorned, scarcely contained themselves from teares, and even groaned for sorrow, that their sacred dignities were so abused. The people could no longer indure this their tyranny, but now every one addrest himself to depose these tyrants. And those that were most earnest herein, were Gurion Iosephs sonne, and Simeon the sonne of Gamaliel, who went about the City to every one in private, and then in a publike assembly exhorted the people to be revenged upon those tyrants, who took from them their libertie, and to addresse themselves to purge the holy Temple from such vile and unclean persons. Likewise the best disposed amongst the Priests, to wit, Iesus the sonne of Gamala, and Ananias the sonne of Ananias, often in publike Sermons reprehended the people, and upbraided them with their sloath, in that they made up more haft to destroy those Zealous people, for so those wretches termed themselves, as though they had devout followers of goodnesse, and not impious malefactors. The people being all assembled together, every man grieved to see the holy place so kept for a denne of theeves, and of their robberies and murders which they committed; yet did they not go about to revenge, thinking themselves too weak to deal with these Zealous, as indeed they were. Then Ananus stood up amongst the middest of them: and having often turned his eyes to the Temple, and beholden it till the tears ranne down his cheeks, Oh said he, how farre better were it for me to die, then to live, to see the House of God thus filled with impietie, and the Sanctuary, wherein none should come but the high Priest, prophaned with the wicked feet of impious persons, being cloathed in Priests apparell, and bear the name of the most authori-tie amongst all names? and do I yet live, and do I save my self, and to be gray-headed, abstain from dying a glorious death? Nay, rather I alone will go against these murderers, and as though I were in a wilderness where there were no man beside my self, I alone will go and offer my soule for Gods sake. For what doth it availe me to live amongst a people, that hath no feeling of their own calamitie, and which seeketh not to redresse their own present mi-series? for you being robbed and spoyled bear all patiently, and being beaten you hold your peace, and there is none amongst you that dare openly mourne for them that are most cruelly murdered. O tyrannous government! But why should I exclaim against the tyrants?

Did not you your selves make them great, and nourish their power and authoritie by your patience? Did not you, by despising those who before were in authoritie being but a few, make all these, who are many in number, tyrants over your selves? have not you keeping your selves quiet, they being armed, turned their swords upon your own heads? and as then it behoved you to resist their enterprizes, when first they injured your kindred; you by suffering, have made them theeves, because at first you made no account, when they destroyed houses and whole families. And this was the cause, that at last the rulers and potentates themselves were set upon, and none would succour them when they were drawne thorow the middest of the Citie, and these murderers butchered them in prison whom you thus betrayed. I will not recount what men they were, and of what birth: but I say they being neither accused nor condemned, having no man to heare them, they were most cruelly murdered, as we have seen any: for they were before our faces led to be slain, as the fattest amongst the whole heard of beasts, all we beholding this: and yet no man opening his mouth nor lifting up his hand.
And will you also indure? will you suffer the holy Sanctuarie to be prophaned before your eyes? and will you, having so emboldned these miscreants as ye see now, your selves stand in feare of them? assure your selves, they would, if they could devise how, commit greater impietie then this is. They keep against you the strongest place in the whole Citie, called a Temple, but now indeed it is a fortresse or Castle of defence. What do you now think, such a tyrannie being established over you, and your enemies being even upon you; what do you deliberate to do? Do you expect the Romanes to come and help you, to save the Temple and sacred mysteries? Our citie is now at that stay, and we have so behaved our selves, that our verie enemies pitie us. O ye wretches! will you not arise, and as the verie brute beasts do, will you not revenge your selves upon them that have thus wounded you? Will not every one of you call to minde the massacre of his friends, and what calamitie he himself hath suffered, and so encourage your selves to be revenged? For ought I can see, you have all lost that sacred and sweet and naturall desire of libertie, and now we embrace bondage, as though we had learned to be bondmen even from our ancestors. But they endured many and hard warres to live in libertie, and yeelded neither to the power of the Egyptians, nor Medes, because they would not be at their command. What need is it to recount unto you the warres of your predecessors? To what end do we interprize this warre against the Romanes (be it commodious for us, or to our disadvantage) if not to obtaine our libertie? And we, who cannot indure to be subject unto the Lords of the whole world, abide our own nation to tyrannize over us. Some may account it adverse fortune to be once overcome by strangers: but to be slaves unto the basest of our own nation, it argueth that we have no spark of gene-rositie in us, and that we bear base and servile mindes. And seeing I have made mention of the Romanes, I will not stick to declare unto you that which now cometh to my minde, to wit, that if we be taken by them (which God forbid) yet shall we suffer no greater mis-erie at their hands, then now we do under these base tyrants. And how can you abstaine from tears, beholding this Temple, enriched by the gift of the Romanes, robbed and spoyled by them of our own Nation, this being our mother Citie? and to see those men murdered, whom the Romanes (although they had conquered us) would not have touched? The Ro-manes never durst presume to passe beyond the limits of prophane places, nor ever violated

A violated they our sacred laws and customes, but alwayes revered the Sanctuary, beholding it onely as farre off: yet now some born and brought up amongst us who are called Jews, tremble not to walk in the Sanctuary, having their hands bathed in the blood of their countrey men and brethren. Who will now fear forrain warres, seeing these civill broils are such? Much better were it for us to fall into our enemies hand: yea, if you will call everie thing by such a name as it deserveth, we shall finde that the Romanes have not violated our laws, but have been the confirmers thereof, and they within our walls are our enemies. True it is, that those that have thus tyrannized over us, deserve death, and that no punishment can be devised great enough for their offence: and all of you were so perswaded before I spake of it, and you were incited against them by that which you have endured at their hands: but yet you fear the multitude of them and their courage; and B moreover that they are in a higher place then you: yet as all this came by your negligence and suffering, so by your delaying they will grow stronger. For their number is daily increased, and every wicked person flieth unto his like; and they are so much the more emboldned, for that as yet no man did once offer to resist their enterprizes: and be sure that if they have time, they will make use of the higher place, and that to your damage. But (beleeve me) if you would but once offer to go against them, their very consciences would abate their haughty minds, and the remembrance of their misdeeds would put them so farre out of tune, that they will not make any benefit of the higher place. Perhaps God in his vengeance will turn their own darts against them for their impietie, and consume them therewith. Let us but onely shew ourselves, and we shall dismay them, yet it is an honour for us, if need be, to C sacrifice our lives for the defence of the holy Temple. My self will assist you with hand and advice, and you shall see that you shall neither want counsell, nor that I will spare my own body to defend you from their treacheries.

The Epilogue
 of Ananus Oration to the people.

Ananus thus exhorted the people against the Zealous, yet he knew well that it was great difficultie to overcome them, being lustie young men, many in number, of great courage, and the more desperate for the remorse of conscience of the horrible crimes, and execrable deeds which they had committed, for they despaired of all hope of pardon for their misdeeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable, that the common-wealth should be so over-ruled. After this exhortation the people cried out, that they were ready to go against D the thieves, and to do as they were requested. Whilest that Ananus selected out the most able men for warre, and set them in order, the Zealous came and issued out upon him, and (having intelligence of all his intents and proceedings by certain spies which they had appointed upon purpose) being enraged sallied out, and in companies, sometime all at once, other times in ambushes, sparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gathered together the people, who were more in number then the thieves: yet were they not so wel armed as they; but what they wanted in arms, their courage did supply. For the citizens were armed with fury, stronger then armour, and they which were gone out of the Temple, with a more desperate boldnes, then all the multitude how great soever it was. For the citizens thought it no abiding for them in the city, except they could drive away the Zealous: and the Zealous thought that they could not escape torments and death it self, except that they were victors.
 E So at last they joyned battell, each under their Captains and Leaders, and first of all both parties cast stones one against another: and if any part fled, then the conquerours pursued them with drawn swords, and many were wounded and slain on both parts. Those townsmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houses; but the Zealous that were hurt, went into the Temple, and polluted the sacred pavements with their blood: so that their Religion was prophaned by their blood. Alwayes the thieves in making excursions got the upper hand. Hereat the citizens being angry, seeing their number every day decreased, reproved the cowards: so that if any of their company offered to flie from the Zealous, they made him stand and resist whether he would or no, not permitting him to passe F away: And thus they bent all their forces against their enemies. At last, the thieves not able to make any longer resistance, by little and little retired themselves into the Temple, and Ananus with his companie entred the Temple by force with them, and brake the rank of his enemies. Then they in the outer Temple were in great fear and fled into the inner Temple, and shut the gates with all speed. Ananus would not offer violence to the sacred gates, and beside that the enemies cast darts from aloft: for he thought it a great offence against God, although he might have got the victory, to introduce the people not being purified. Wherefore he elected six thousand of the chief of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keep the porches, and others to succeed in their places while they took rest.
 And many of the better sort of the citizens being by the chief of the Citie placed to keep watch there, hired other poor folk to watch in their steads. But John, who as before we have told, fled from Giscala, wrought the ruin of all these. This man being full of deceit, and above all measure desirous of rule, long ago intended to overthrow the common-wealth. This man from that time counterfeited himself to be against the theeves, and so day and night accompanied Ananias and the rest, both in their consultations, and when they went to visit the watch, and he disclosed all their secrets unto the Zealous: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gave the theeves intelligence thereof before it was put in practice, yet he seemed to be very dutifull unto Ananias, and the rest of the Nobilitie, hereby hoping to conceal his treacherie. But it fell out contrary to his expectation; for this his too much reverence caused him to be suspected, because they noted him to play the parasite: and for that uncalled he daily intruded himself into their consultations, he was mildoubted to bewray their secrets. For Ananias perceived that the enemies knew all their secrets, and Johns deeds did carrie suspicion of treason, yet could they not easily remove him, his craft was such: besides this, he was bolstered out by many Noble men who were employed in these affairs. Wherefore they thought it good to request of him an oath of friendship, which he denied not, but added moreover that he would be true unto the people, and neither disclose any deed or secret counsell of theirs unto the enemies, and that he with heart and hand would truly endeavour to suppress the Rebels. So Ananias did no more mistrust him, because of his oath, and admitted him afterward to all their counsels, nothing suspecting him. Nay, they now trusted him so farre, that they sent him for an Embassador unto the Zealous, to perswade them to peace: for they were very carefull lest the Temple through their deeds should be defiled and prophaned, or that any of the Jews should there be slain. But he, as though he had sworn unto the Zealous and not unto the Citizens, entred boldly amongst them: and standing in the midst of them, he recounted unto them that he had often for their sakes undergone great danger, in suffering none of the townsmens secrets to be concealed from them, but declared unto them all that ever Ananias and his confederates determined against them; and that even now he was like together with them to fall into extreme danger, except it pleased God as it were miraculously to assist them. For, said he, now Ananias without delay will send unto Vespasian, and he will send his army in all haste and take the Citie: and that he had appointed the next day following for purification to purifie the people, that so under pretence of piety he might let them into the Citie, or else they might enter in by force: and that he could not see how either they were able to endure a long siege, or to encounter with so huge an army: adding moreover, that it was Gods providence that he should be sent unto them to make a peace, when Ananias purposed so soon as they were unarmed to set upon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themselves, they should either intreat the watchmen that besieged them to be good unto them, or else get some succour from some place without the Temple. For (said he) he that amongst you hopeth for pardon if you be overcome, doth not remember what hath past, and what he hath done; but let them perswade themselves, they that have beene injured, will not forget and forgive so soon, as he that injured them is sorry for his fact. Nay, many times the repentance of malefactors maketh them more hated then before, and the wrath of men that are injured, is increased by authoritie, and licence to do what they please. And they might be sure that the friends and kinsfolks of them that were slain, would alwayes lay wait to requite the injuries, and that all the people were incensed against them for breaking the laws: so that although some few would take pitie upon them, yet the greater companie being most in number would prevail. With these and such like speeches John terrified the Zealous, yet durst he not openly tell them what he meant by forraign help, notwithstanding he meant the Idumzans. And that he might more enflame the theeves, he went unto the chiefeest of them, and secretly told them that Ananias was cruelly bent against them, and breathed out many threatnings against them in particular.

CHAP. VI.

How the Idumzans came unto Ierusalem, and what they did there.

Eleazar one of the Zealous causeth the
be sent for.

Amongst the Zealous there were two principall, Eleazar the sonne of Simon, who above all the rest was thought most fit to give counsell, and to execute that which was consulted upon: and Zacharias the sonne of Amphicalus, who both descended from the line of the Priests. These two, understanding, that beside the generall threatnings their deaths were especially vowed, and that the faction of Ananias to get him into authoritie, had sent to call the Romanes (for this, John had fained)

- A fained) deliberated with themselves what to do, having so short time to provide. For they supposed that presently the people would assault them, and they bethought themselves that now it was too late to seek for forrain help: for they might endure all calamitie, before they could give notice hereof unto any that would help them. Yet at last they determined to call the Idumæans to aid them, and so they wrote a brief Epistle unto them, letting them understand how Ananias, having seduced the people, meant to betray the mother Citie of their nation unto the Romanes, and that they fighting for their liberty, were by him besieged in the Temple: that the time wherein they expected safetie was very short: and that if they did not presently send succour, they were like to fall into Ananias and their enemies hands, and the Citie to be brought in subjection under the Romanes: and also committed many things to be spoken by word of mouth unto the Rulers of Idumæa. For which purpose were chosen two principall men eloquent and apt to perswade; and that, which was in this case required, swift of foot: it was certain that the Idumæans would presently aid them, it being a clownish rude nation, and prone to sedition and alteration, much rejoycing therein; and by flatterie easily entreated to warres, making as much haste to them, as if they went to some festivall solemnitie: so that there onely was required two speedie messengers. Which two were readie and quick men for such an exploit, and were both called by the name of Ananias. These presently came unto the Governours of Idumæa: and they reading the Epistle, and hearing that which the messengers were to say unto them, like mad men assembled all the people together in poste haste, and proclaimed warres; so the people in an instant gathered themselves together, and were all armed to fight for the libertie of their mother City: and twenty thousand being assembled together under the government of four Captains, came with all speed to Jerusalem: the names of them were these, Iohn and James, sonnes of Susa, and Simon the sonne of Caiapha, and Phineas the sonne of Clofath. Ananias and his watchmen knew not of the going of those two messengers, nor of the watches in the Citie, but they understood of the Idumæans coming, and so shut the gates and placed watchmen upon the walls: yet they thought it not good to go out and fight with them, but first with peaceable words to perswade them to concord and peace. Wherefore Iesus the eldest of the Priests next after Ananias, stood in a tower opposit against them; and spake in this manner:
- D Though many and divers tumults and troubles have molested this Citie, yet did I never so much admire any of them, as to come with such fury and readinesse to help these wicked people, against all expectation: for (said he) you are come against us to help most vile persons: and that so rashly, as it behoved not you to have done, if your Metropolitan City had requested your help against barbarous people. If I should perceive your manners like unto theirs that have requested your help, I would then think you had some reason to come, for nothing causeth firmer friendship then agreement or sympathy in manners. But they if they were narrowly sought into, have every one deserved a thousand deaths. For they are the basest and very out-cast of all the countrey people; who having spent their patrimonies riotously, and played the theeves in all places and cities about them, now at last have got into this holy Citie, most religious of all cities, and have profaned the holy place by their impietie: they tremble not to be drunk even in the holy Temple, and there they consume in banquetting the spoiles they have gotten from them, whom they have massacred. And you come to help these men with as great an army and provision, as though that this your mother citie had by publike consent requested your help against forrain enemies. Is not this the injury of fortune, that your whole nation hath conspired and bent all their forces against us to help these miscreants? Till now I knew not what moved you so quickly and so suddenly to arm your selves to assist theeves against your native countrey men. What? Have you been informed of the Romanes coming, and of the betraying of the city? For even now I heard some of you mutter, that you came to deliver your mother citie. Is it not a wonder to see this device and invention of these malefactors? But they could devise no other way to incite other against us (who even naturally desire liberty, and are ready for the same to spend our dearest blood in conflict with the enemy) but to faine us to be destroyers of libertie: But it behooveth you to consider who are these calumniators, and against whom these calumniationes are devised, and then to gather the verity of the matter, not from forged tales; fained at mens pleasures, but from the thing it self. What should move us now to yeeld unto the Romanes, having indured as yet nothing to constrain us thereunto? when if we had liked to live under their obedience, neither needed we at first to have rebelled; and beside that, if we had repented our selves, we might have again submitted our selves, and obtained their favour before this time that all the countrey round about us is destroyed. Nay, if now we would yeeld, it is not easie for us: for the spoil of Galilee, which they having already conquered, hath made them proud, and that we in humbling our selves unto them, being neer unto us, should incurre an infamy worse then death it self. True it is, I think peace better then warres; yet being once provoked to warres, and the fight being begun, I had rather die a glorious death then to live in captivity. Do they enform you that we have secretly sent the chief of our city to the Romanes, or that by common consent of all the people we have done it? If they say that we did it secretly, let them then tell what friends of ours were sent, or what servants of ours were ministers to effect this treason. Did they take any messenger of ours and finde letters about him? How can that be hid from all our citizens, with whom we do every hour converse? And is it possible that a few, shut up in the Temple, who could not come out into the City, should know our secrets, all the whole City knowing nothing? or do they now first know it when they are like to be punished for their impiety? never suspecting any of us to be traitors, so long as they were in no fear. If they say that it was done by common consent of all the people, why then all men were there when the speech was made unto the people, to exhort them thereunto, and request their good wils, and so the news thereof would quickly have come unto your ears: Or what need had we to send Embassadors, if we had been now already certain to come to composition with the Romanes? Let them tell you who was appointed for that Embassage. These are but devices and excuses of them, who fear to have a death according to their deserts, and a shift to escape punishment.

If fate had so decreed that our city should be betrayed unto the enemy, assure your selves that they, who do thus accuse us, would have betrayed it themselves; who have committed already all sort of impieties, treason onely excepted. It is your part, seeing you are come hither in armes, first (as reason and justice requireth) to assist your mother City against them who tyrannize over us, and violate our lawes: who treading down our lawes, make all that justice, which they can effect with their sword. And first of all they took Noble men and cast them in prison, drawing them from amidst the publike assembly; and never being accused nor condemned, nothing respecting their entreaties, put them to death. If it please you to come in peaceable and not hostile maner into our city, your selves shall plainly behold evident tokens of this that I speak unto you: to wit, houses ruinated and made desolate by their robberies, the wives & families of them that are slain, in mourning apparell, and howling and crying in every part of the city: for there is no one amongst us that hath not tasted the persecution of these wretched men, who are gone so far that not content to make this city their refuge (which is the chief, and a spectacle to all others for sanctity) after they had robbed and spoiled all the countrey and villages, and cities hereabout, now lastly they have made the sacred Temple a refuge and place to carry all their spoils, which they have impiously gotten in this city, unto. This Temple they do make their bulwarke to issue out and to retire unto; and from thence they make incursions upon the Citizens: and this is the place where they practise all their villanies against us. And this sacred place, which all the world, even the most barbarous and savage people thereof do reverence, is now defiled by the horrible robberies which one born amongst us committed. And now being in desperation, they rejoyce to see nation against nation, and city against city, & people against people, and our own countreymen to turn themselves against their own bowels: when contrariwise, (as I have already said) it had been your parts and duties to joyn with us, and help us to exterminate these malefactors, and be revenged of them for this lie, in that they presumed to call you to help them, whom they had just reason to fear as revengers of their impieties: yet if you make account of these mens prayers, vouchsafe (laying your weapons aside) to come into our city like friends, and be your selves judges between us and them whom you came to help. And consider what favour we shew them; who permit them to plead their own causes before you, they being guilty of so heinous crimes, and having put to death persons of such account; never accused nor permitted to speak for themselves: yet this commoditie we will grant them for your sake. But if you continue in your anger against us, and refuse this offer to be our judges: then let us entreat you that leaving both parts, you would neither imbrue your hands in our blood, nor lend your aide unto these miscreants against your mother city. And if you suspect any of us to be confederates with the Romanes, you may keep all passages, and then seek to defend your Metropolis, when you have proof of any such matter as is allead-ged against us, and punish the authors of that treason, when you have convicted them. The enemies cannot prevent you being already planted so neer the City. If you like of none of these, marvell not that we shut our gates against you, coming in armed and hostile maner.
Jesus spake thus unto them. But the Idumians being angrie, were not moved hereby, and so much the more, for that entrance into the citie was denied them, and their Generals were exceeding

A exceeding wroth, thinking it slavery to lay down their arms, especially at the command of another.

Then one of the Captains named Simon, the son of Cabla, having with much ado gotten his souldiers to be silent, he stood in a place where the Priests might heare him, and said, That he now did not wonder that those who maintained libertie, were enclosed and besieged in the Temple, seeing that they of the City now shut their gates against his followers, the City being common and free for all men, and that perhaps they were ready to open the city gates for to receive the Romanes. And he spake unto the Idumians from a tower, and commanded them to cast down their arms, which they took onely for the libertie of the Citie, when they durst not trust their owne nation to keep the same; yet would have them

B Judges of the discord: and that accusing others for killing some not convicted, they themselves would condemne all the whole nation of ignominy; and that they had now shut the City gates against their own countrey men, which was common for all strangers to come unto for religion sake. Did we make haste towards you, to fight against our own nation, which came onely to preserve your liberty? But this is as true, as that they whom you thus besiege have wronged you, and as the accusation you forge against them. And you keeping in hold those that are the defenders of the Common-wealth, do then shut the city gates against men of your own blood: lastly, you impose upon us contumelious commands, and say that they do tyrannize over you, over whom indeed you do. Who can any longer endure this your mockery, that perceiveth how impossible your allegations are? For who can justly accuse those that ye keep shut up in the Temple, because that they presumed to punish traitors whom you grace with the title of noble and innocent, because they were your confederates? Onely in this they are blame-worthy, that they did not begin with you, but left alive such members of that conspiracy. Except also you will say, that the Idumians shut you out of your Citie, you your selves not permitting us to come and offer sacrifices. But though they were too mercifull, yet we Idumians will conserve the house of God, and will fight for the common good of our countrey, and will be revenged both of the enemies that are without the City, and the traitors within. And here will we remain before the City, till either the Romanes come and deliver you, or till you change your mindes and bethink your selves what a jewell it is to have libertie.

CHAP. VII.

Of the massacre of the Jews by the Idumians.

Like the whole multitude agreed with a loud crie unto these speeches of Simon. And Iesus departed sorrowfull, seeing that the Idumians would agree to no reason, and that thereby their Citie should suffer double warres. For the Idumians wrath was not yet asswaged, who took the matter in great disdain that they were not permitted to enter into the City, and also for that they thought the Zealous very strong, and they

E themselves were ashamed that they could not come to help them, so that many repented that they were come thither. Yet would they not for shame return, nothing being done by them: and so rashly placing their Tabernacles neer unto the City wals, they determined to stay there. But that night there fell a most huge tempest: for there was a great stormy winde and an exceeding great rain mixt with fearfull thunder and horrible lightning, and the Earthquake with strange noyses: whereupon all men thought that this motion of the earth, did signifie the death of mankind, and portend some great matter. The Idumians and Townes-men were both of one minde: for they thought that God was angry with them for bearing arms against their Metropolis, and perswaded themselves that they could not escape death if they continued in their purpose. Ananus and his followers perswaded themselves

F that they had now overcome them without warre, and that God had fought for them against the Idumians. But they were false prophets, and what they judged to befall their enemies, that fell upon themselves. In the mean while the Idumians lay as close together as they could, and covered their heads with their shields, so that by this means the rain did them not so much harme. The Zealous were pensive for the Idumians more than for themselves, and devised which way they might succour them. Then the boldest amongst them advised the rest, by force to oppresse the watchmen, and so to go into the City, and open the gates to the Idumians that came to help them, for it was easie to surprize the watchmen, by reason that many of them were unarmed, and unfit for warre, and the Citizens could not easily be assembled together, for every man because of the tempest kept his house. And suppose that there there were danger, yet were it better to endure all mischiefs that might ensue, then to permit such an army shamefully to perish, who came at their request to help them. But the wiser fort dissuaded the rest from this, seeing both a stronger watch placed to keep them in, and the City wals diligently guarded because of the Idumæans: and moreover, perswading themselves that Ananus ceased not, but went up and down, first from one watch, and then to another; yet that night he did not so, not for slothfulnesse, but because that the destinies had so decreed that thereby both he and the watch-men should perish. For about mid-night the storme increasing, the watch-men fell into a sound sleep.

Then the Zealous determined to file the bars and bolts of the grates in sunder; to effect this, they took the instruments which were consecrated to the Temple, and this attempt was much furthered by the huge winde and thunder, which made such a noise that they could not be heard: so issuing out of the Temple, they went privily to the wals, and opened that gate neer unto which the Idumæans lay; and suspecting that Ananus would make some resistance, they first of all drew their swords, and then together with the Idumæans came in:
and if at that time they had assaulted the City, they had without any let or hindrance destroyed all the people therein: so great was their rage at that time. But first of all they hast-ned to assist their fellows, whom they left besieged, and requested the Idumæans not to leave them in danger, for whose succour they were come, nor permit them to incurre greater damage: for having first surprized the watch-men, it would be more easie for them to assault the City: which if they did not, but first set upon the Citizens, they would presently assemble together, and oppose themselves against them, and not permit them to ascend up into the Temple. The Idumæans consented unto this, and so they passed thorow the City into the Temple. And the Zealous remaining in the Temple, carefully expected their coming; at whose arrivall they took courage, and joyning with the Idumæans, came out of the inner Temple, and set upon the watch: and some being slain who were fast asleep, the rest were awaked by the cries of others, and so betook themselves to their arms, to defend themselves, being yet amazed. And at first, thinking that they were onely the Zealous that gave the assault, hoped onely by their multitude to suppress them; but seeing others without the temple also assailing them, they perceived the Idumæans were broken in: so the greater part of them being dismayed, laid down their weapons and cried; and onely a few of them, young men well armed, and of good courage, encountred with the Idumæans, and for a good space defended their idle fellows: others went and advertised the Inhabitants what was done, yet none durst come to help them, because they now knew that the Idumæans were got in, but every one lamented their hard fortune: and the women made great lamentation, when any of the watch-men fell into danger. The Zealous also answered their cries with the like, and then the tempest and thunder made all more dreadfull. The Idumæans spared none, because that they were naturally cruel & fierce to shed blood: and angry that they were so beate with the tempest, they used them most cruelly, by whose means they were shut out of the Citie, sparing neither those who requested favour, nor them who made resistance, for they slew many even as they were entreating them to remember that they were of their own blood, and requesting them to spare them for reverence of their Temple. There was no way to flye, nor any hope of escape: being driven up in a narrow roome, they hurt themselves more then the enemies did, by crowding and treading upon one another, for there was no place to flye, nor their enemies ceased not to kill them. Being in this desperate estate, not knowing how to doe, they cast themselves headlong down into the Citie, and so died a more miserable death (in my minde) then they that died by the enemies sword. The next day there was found slain eight thousand and five hundred, and all the outer Temple flowed with blood. Yet this massacre sufficed not the Idumæans rage, but turning themselves against the City, they robbed and spoiled all houses, and killed all they met, making no account of the death of the rest of the multitude. They made diligent search for the Priests, and many laid violent hands upon them, and killed them: and standing upon their dead corpses, sometime they upbraided Ananus with the peoples favour towards him, sometime Jesús with the words he spake upon the wall unto them, and were so impious, as that they cast away their dead bodies unburied, notwithstanding that the Jews in this point are so religious, that after sunne-set they take down the dead bodies of malefactors, who by sentence have been adjudged unto the crosse, and bury them.

I think I do not greatly misse the mark, if I affirme Ananus his death to have been the destruction of the city, & from that time forth the wals of Jerusalem to have been overthrown, and the Common-wealth of the Jews to have perished in that day when they beheld their Priest and Governour slain, even in the midst of the city. He was a man that led a laudable and

A and most just life: and being in great dignitie, honour, and reputation; yet would he not exalt himself above any one, were he never so base. He was a man who thirsted after liberty, and bare the rule and government of the Common-wealth. He continually preferred the publike commoditie before his own private gain, being alwaies desirous of peace; for he foresaw that the Romanes could not be withstood; and that, if the Jews did not quickly accord with them, their ruine was at hand: briefly I say, that had Ananus lived, they had yeelded with him unto the Romanes. For he was an eloquent Orator and could persuade admirably: whereby he had now gained unto his side those that hindered him, and caused the wars, whom if they had had for their Captain against the Romanes, it had not been so easie for the Romanes to have conquered them. With him was joyned Iesus inferiour to Ananus, yet excellling all the rest. So that I think Almighty God having decreed the totall ruine of the Citie, being now violated and filled with iniquitie, and meaning by fire as it were to purifie the holy Temple which was now defiled and prophaned, he first took away the defenders thereof, and those that loved them most dearly. So they who a little before were clothed in sacred apparell, and revered of all those that from the furthest parts of the world came to Jerusalem, now lay murdered and naked in the open streets, left as it were a prey to be torn in pieces with dogs or wild beasts, who earst were the authors of piety and religion. I think that Vertue it self wept to see wickednesse so prevaille.

CHAP. I.

Of another massacre, and of the return of the Idumæans, and the cruelty of the Zealous.

Such was the end of Ananus and Iesus. After whose death the Idumæans and the Zealous massacred the people, as though they had been a flock of pernicious beasts, and every one was slain wheresoever he was found: and taking the nobilitie and younger sort of men, they kept them bound in prison, hoping that by deferring their deaths, some of them would become partakers with them. Yet none was thereby moved, but every one desired to die, rather then impiously to conspire against their own countrey: yet were they most cruelly whipped before they were put to death, their whole body being all as it were one sore place by whipping and stripes: and so when they could not indure these torments any longer, then were they killed. And who so was taken on the day time, was in the night carried to prison, and those that died in prison and torments, they then cast their dead bodies out, that they might have place to imprison others in their roomes. And the people were so terrified, that none durst weep openly for his friend, nor bury the dead body of his kinsman; yea those that were in prison durst not openly weep, but secretly, looking about them, lest any of their enemies should espie them. For whosoever mourned for any that was afflicted, was presently himself used in the same maner as he had been for whom he lamented; and sometime some in the night scraped up a little earth with their hands, and therewithall covered the dead body of their friend; and some bolder then the rest, did the like in the day time. And in this generall slaughter were twelve thousand young noble men slain by this means: and thus being hated for these massacres, they mocked and flouted the Magistrates, and made no account of their judgements. So that when they determined to put one Zacharie the sonne of Baruch to death, a noble man and one of the chiefe of the City (for they perceived that he was an enemy to their wickednesse, and loved the vertuous, and one that was rich, by whose death they hoped not onely to have the spoile of his goods, but also to be rid of such a one who might be able to resist their bad purposes) they called seventie of the best amongst the common people together as it were in judgement, yet they having no authoritie; and before them they accused Zacharie that he had betrayed the Common-wealth unto the Romanes, and that for that intent he had sent unto Vespasian: but neither shewed any evidence nor prooff thereof, but onely they affirmed it to be so; and therefore would have credit given unto their words. When Zacharie perceived that under pretence of being called unto judgement; he was deceitfully brought into prison; and having no hope of life, yet he spared not to speak liberally his minde: but began to scorn the rage and pretence of his enemies, and purged himself of the crimes whereof he was accused; and converting his speech against his accusers, he laid open all their iniquities, and much lamented the miseries and troubles of the City.

In the mean while the Zealous gnashed their teeth, and could scarcely contain themselves from drawing their swords, and were desirous that their pretended accusation and judgement might be ended. He also requested them, who by these miscreants were appointed his Judges, to remember justice, notwithstanding those dangerous times. The seventie Judges all pronounced that he was to be absolved and freed as unguilty; and rather chose to die, then to cause his death who was innocent. This sentence being pronounced, the Zealous began to shout and cry with a loud voice, and they all were angry at the Judges, who did not understand to what end that counterfeit authoritie was given them. Then two of the boldest amongst them set upon Zacharie, and killed him in the midst of the Temple, and mocked him, saying; Thou hast now our sentence and absolution, farre more certain then the other was, and presently they cast him down from the Temple into the valley underneath: and then contumeliously with the hilts of their swords they did beat the Judges out of the Temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being dispersed thorow the whole City, they might tell the people as messengers from them, of their miserable captivitie. The Idumæans were now sorrowfull for their coming: for they misliked these proceedings: who being assembled together, one of the Zealous secretly told them all that their faction had done from their beginning; and that the Idumæans had taken arms, because they were informed, how that the Metropolitan Citie was by the Priests betrayed unto the Romanes; but as they might perceive, there was no prooff nor signe of any such matter: and that indeed

A indeed the Zealous who pretended themselves conservers of the City, were meer enemies; and exercised tyranny over the citizens even from their beginning. And though they had associated themselves with such wicked persons, and made themselves partakers of such and so many murders, yet thought now to cease from such wickedness, and not assist men so impious to destroy their countrey laws and religion. For although they took it in bad part that the City gates were shut upon them; yet now they were sufficiently revenged of those that were the cause thereof. Now was Ananus himself slain, and almost all the people in one night: whereof many of them ere long would repent, and that they might now themselves perceive the crueltie of them, who requested their aid, to be more then barbarous: so that they blusht not to commit their villanies openly in the sight of them who had saved their lives; and their misdemeanour and impiety would be inputed unto the Idumæans, because they neither hindred their mischievous practises, nor forsook their society. And that therefore it was their parts (seeing that it was now evident that the report of treason was onely calumny, and that no assault by the Romanes was to be feared, likewise that an invincible force was established against the city) for to depart home, and by forsaking the society of the impious acquit themselves of their impiety, as being by them deceived, and so against their wils made partakers therof. The Idumæans were hereby perswaded, and first of all they loosed them that were in prison, in number 2000. of the vulgar, and presently leaving the citie, they went unto Simon; of whom we will speak hereafter, and so they departed home.

The Idumæans depart out of Jerusalem.

Their departure was against the expectation of both parts: for the people, not knowing that the Idumæans were penitent for that they had done, rejoyced as now delivered from their enemies: and the Zealous grew more insolent and proud, as though they never had needed help, but now were delivered from them, in reverence of whom they abstained from villany. So now they used no delay to effect their impiety: for they spent not much time in taking advice; but whatsoever seemed best unto them, presently without any delay they put it in practice. But chiefly they murdered those men that were strong and valiant: for they envied the nobility for their vertue: And they thought it a principall point first to be effected, nor to leave any one man of account alive. Wherefore they slew amongst the rest Gorion a noble man of great birth and dignitie, one who loved the people, and was very bountifull and a lover of liberty: so that there was none amongst the Jews like him, who for desire of libertie and his other vertues was put to death. But neither could Niger Peraita escape their hands, a man who in warres against the Romanes had shewed himselfe valiant: who although he often cried out and shewed the scars of his wounds received in defence of his countrey; yet they ceased not for all this most shamefully to dragge him thorow the city: and being led out of the citie, despairing of life, he entreated that he might be buried. But the barbarous people denying his request slew him. Who at his death besought God that the Romanes might come and revenge it upon them, and that plague and famine, and civill discord might light upon their Citie. Whose prayers God heard, sending all upon them which he did justly require, and first of all they were plagued with civill warres amongst themselves. Niger being thus slain, they were freed from the fear that they had of him, how that he would resist their wickedness. There was no part of the common people, who were not by some forged tale or other put to death. For some were slain, for that long since they had borne arms against their own citizens; and they who were innocent in all points were put to death, for some occasion devised in the time of peace: and they who did not converse with them were murdered, as such as contemned them: and they that freely and friendly conversed with them were slain, as men that sought to betray them: and the greatest offenders, and the least offenders were all punished alike, to wit, with death: for no man escaped, except he was either poor or of very base condition.

The civill discord amongst the Jews.

IN the mean while the Romanes addressed their courage against the Citie of Jerusalem; and seeing them at great variance among themselves, thought this to be for their great advantage. Upon this they incited Vespasian their Generall, affirming that it was Gods providence (who fought for them) that the Jews should be at civill warres among themselves, and that therefore he should not overslip so good an opportunity: for the Jews would quickly be friends again one with another, either by the weariness of civill warre, or else repenting themselves of that which they had done. To whom Vespasian answered, that they were ignorant what was to be done, being rather desirous as it were in a Theater to shew their forces and strength, then with him to consider what was profitable and expedient. For (said he) if we presently assault them, our coming will make concord amongst our enemies, and so we shall bring upon our selves their forces yet firme and strong: but by expecting a little while, they should have lesse adoo to conquer them, their chiefest forces being destroyed by their own civill warres; And that God was more their friend then they were aware of, who without their labour and pain delivered the Jews into their hands, and will give us the victory without endangering of our army: And that therefore it was rather their parts to be as it were beholders of that tragedie, then to fight against men desirous of death, and troubled with the greatest evill that possible could be, to wit, domesticall sedition, and civill warres. And if any think that the victory is not famous being gotten without fight, let him know and consider the uncertain events of wars: and that it is better, if it be possible, to get a victory without bloudshed, then therewith to hazard the victory. For they who by counsell and advice do any worthy act, deserve no lesse praise then they, who by force of arms achieve a victory. Moreover, in the mean time that the enemies one destroyed another, his souldiers might take rest, and so be stronger and better able to fight when need should require. Beside that, it seemed not that there was so much haste required to get the victory: for the Jews neither prepared arms, or engines of warre, nor levied any forces, nor sought for aide, and so by delay no damage could ensue: but that they would plague one another more by civill wars, then his army could by taking them and their city. And therefore whether they considered it best to abstain from assaulting them (who fought with one another) for securitie sake, or else for vain glory, though the honour of the victory diminished thereby: yet he held it not meet to fight against them, who were at civill warres amongst themselves; for so it would be justly said, the victory was not to be imputed to us, but to their discord.

The Captains all consented, and thought this advice of Vespasian best: and presently it appeared how profitable his counsell was. For every day many fled unto him to escape the hands of the Zealous: yet it was hard and dangerous to flye, because all the waies were guarded with watch-men. And if any man upon any occasion whatsoever were taken upon the way, he was presently killed, as one who intended to have fled unto the Romanes: yet he that fee'd the watch men with money, escaped away safely; and he that did not, was counted as a traitor: so that onely rich men could escape, and the poor were left to the slaughter. The multitude of dead bodies that lay on heaps together was innumerable, and many of them who had fled unto the Romanes, returned again into the City, chusing rather to die there: for the hope they had to be buried in their native soile, made death there seem more tolerable. But they became so cruell, that they neither permitted them who were slain within, nor them without the Citie, to be buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their countrey laws, to abolish the law of nature, yea and by their impiety to pollute the sacred divinity with injustice, let the dead bodies rot above the ground: and whosoever attempted to bury any one of them that were slain, whether he were friend or kinsman, were presently put to death, and left unburied, as men forsaking their Citie, and flying to the enemy. To be breef, nothing so much increased their calamity as mercy: for the wicked people were herewith, as it were provoked to wrath, whose displeasure and crueltie was extended from the living unto the dead, and from the dead unto the living. And such fear fell upon the whole Citie, that those that were left alive, deemed them happy, that being dead, were at rest, and free from those miseries: and they that were in prison, in respect of the torments they endured, thought themselves unhappier then they who lay unburied. All humane justice was by them perverted, and they scorned and mocked at all divine and holy things, and proudly derided the oracles of the Prophets, esteeming them as fables and jests. But having now condemned all laws established by their forefathers for the punishment of vice, and increasing of vertue, at last they found that true which by them was foretold, concerning the destruction of themselves and their countrey. For there was an old prophecy, that when sedition reigned amongst them, and their own hands had first violated the Temple of God and holy things, that then their City should be destroyed by warre, and their holy places should be burned with fire, according to the use and custome of warre. And the Zealous giving credit to this prophecy, made themselves the ministers of this action.

Ue John, who long ago desired to be in chief authority, as tyrant over all the rest; thought it not sufficient to be in as great reputation as his fellows; wherefore by little and little joyning unto himself the most impious of all the Zealous, he divided himself from their union and fellowship: So that now every one perceived (in that he alwaies neglected what others commanded, and imperiously commanded what himself thought good) that he affected principallity; and many joyned to him for fear, some for favour (for he had a smooth tongue, able to perswade them unto what he would:) many also followed him, thinking it better that all the impiety before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, then unto all men in generall. Moreover, being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to give politike counsell, he wanted not followers, notwithstanding that many of the contrary faction left him, envying that he, who before was their equall, should now be their Lord and commander. Fear also terrified them from living under the government of one man; for they thought that if he once prevailed, he could not easily be overcome: and again, if he were deposed, that he would pick quarrels against them in the end, because that they resisted him in the beginning. So every man determined rather to suffer all misery in warre, then to submit himself, and perish like a slave. Thus the sedition was divided, and John was chief of the faction against the zealous: so between them they appointed garrisons in every place; and if by chance they combated together, they did little or nothing hurt one another, but their chief contention was who should bear most sway amongst the people: and they did strive on both parts who should have the greatest part of the spoile. Thus the City at one time was vexed with three intolerable mischiefs, and evils, to wit, war, tyranny, and sedition: and yet war seemed a lesse evil then the rest unto the commonalty. In brief, many leaving their native soile, fled unto strangers for succour, and found among the Romanes safety, who with their own nation lived in continuall danger. There was also then begun the fourth evill, which wrought the ruine of the whole nation. Not far from the City there was a Castle called Maffada, builded by the ancient Kings of Jerusalem, very strong to lay their treasure in, and their munition for warre, and to retire themselves thereunto in time of need, for the safety of their persons. This Castle was taken and kept by that sort of thieves that were called Sicarii, who for fear durst rob no more. These thieves seeing the Roman army now idle, and the thieves in Jerusalem at civill wars and sedition among themselves, they took courage, and again fell to their villainies. And so on that day which is the feast of unleavened bread (which the Jews do keep holy, in memory of their deliverance out of the Egyptian captivity) deceiving the watchmen, they seized upon a Fort, called Engaddi: and before the townesmen could arme and unite themselves together, they were by these persons driven out of the town, who also killed them that could not flie, to wit, women and children, to the number of more then seven hundred, and so sacking the houses, and taking the fruits that were now ripe, they carried all unto Maffada: and so they wasted all the villages and whole countrey round about them; many wicked persons daily flocking unto them and joyning with them: and by their example other thieves that a while had been quiet, now robbed again, and spoiled in every part of Judaea. And as in a body, if the principall member thereof be sick, all other parts of it are afflicted: so Jerusalem being filled with tumults and discord, those that were without the city found licence to rob and spoile: and all they that had their towns destroyed where they were wont to inhabit, went into the wilderness. Then they assembling and uniting themselves together, not so many as an army, yet more then a company of thieves, they brake into the towns and Temples; and as in war it cometh to passe, they purposed to assault them, by whom they had suffered such injurie: but they were prevented, for the thieves understanding of their coming, fled with the spoile they had gotten. And there was no part of Judaea that did not perish together with Jerusalem their mother city. Those that fled unto the Romanes, certified Vespasian hereof: for although the seditious persons did keep and observe all passages, and kill them that offered to flie, yet many secretly stole away from them, and besought Vespasian both to help the oppressed city, and to take compassion upon the reliques of their nation: affirming that many had been butchered for wishing well to the Romanes, and many being yet alive, were yet in great danger. And Vespasian moved to compassion sionate their calamities, came with his army neerer Jerusalem, as though he would have besieged it: but indeed his intent was to deliver it from the siege, hoping in the mean time to conquer that part of the countrey that was yet untoucht, and so to leave nothing to hinder him when he should begin the siege. Wherefore coming unto Gadara, the strongest place and mother City of all the countrey beyond the river, he entred into it the fourth day of March: for the chieftest of the city, unknown unto the seditious people, had sent Embassa-dors unto him, partly desiring peace, partly to save their goods and lives, and promised him to yeeld the town into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara: and their enemies knew not of their Embassage, till they saw Vespasian at the City gates. And so despairing that they were able to keep the City, by reason they had in the town many enemies, more in number and stronger then themselves; and moreover, seeing Vespasian even now almost at the City: and thinking it a shame to flie and not to be revenged of their enemies; they took Dolefus (who was both a noble man and chief of the city, and also the author of that Embassage) and killed him, and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the city. Now the Romanes army approaching neer unto the city, the people of Gadara went forth & received Vespasian joyfully, who also confirmed a league betwixt them and him, and left them a company of horse and footmen to defend them against the incursions of the fugitives their enemies: for they themselves before the Romanes requested it, destroyed the City wals, that so they might shew themselves to desire peace, in that destroying their wals, if after they desired to rebell they could not.

Vespasian then sent Placidus with five hundred horsemen, and three thousand footmen to pursue those, that were fled out of Gadara, and he with the rest of his army returned to Cesarea. But the fugitives perceiving themselves to be pursued by Placidus, before he could overtake them, got into a town called Bethenabris: and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arme themselves, and so rashly they came against Placidus. Placidus and his army seemed a little to give back, to the intent to draw them further from the wall: and then having compassed them about in a fit place, they wounded them as farre off with darts and arrows. Then the Jews seeking to flie, were prevented by the horsemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Romanes footmen all put to the sword, never shewing any sign of valour. For the Jews assaulting the Ro-manes, being all invironed and quite covered with their shields as with a wall, and not being able to break into their battell, they were slain by the Romanes darts: but their darts could do the Romanes no harme, and so like fierce and savage beasts they wilfully ran upon their enemies swords, and so were slain, some having all their face cut with swords, some killed by the horsemen. For Placidus was carefull to intercept their passage unto the town, and to hinder their recourse unto it, and brought those back again that fled towards it, using his darts, and killing those that were next him, and those who fled as far off for fear, he caused to return, till at last the strongest amongst them brake away, and got unto the town wals: And those that were within the city knew not what to do, for they would not shut the fugitives of Gadara out of the Citie, because they desired to let their own citizens in, and again they perceived that if they let them in, they thereby should work the overthrow of the City, as it fell out indeed they did. For the gates being set open for them to come in, the Romanes horsemen almost brake into the town with them, yet the gates were shut before they could get in.
Then Placidus with all his souldiers assaulted the town, and fighting a sore fight which continued even untill the Evening, at last he got the wals, and the town, and slew the weaker sort: for the stronger fled: so the souldiers sacked the houses, and then fired the town. They who escaped thence, incited the whole country to flie with them, reporting their calamities with the most, and affirming that all the Romanes army was at hand: and so they put all the inhabitants there in great fear, and having assembled a great multitude, they fled unto Jericho, which place they put their confidence in, for that it was strong and populous, Placidus having horsemen, and being encouraged with his former victory, pursued them unto Jordan, and whomsoever he overtook he slew, and at the river he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; and slaying, because that the river being waxed deeper by abundance of raine, that had lately fallen, they could not passe over it.

Wherefore necessitie forced them to fight, because they could not flie: and placing themselves along the banks of the river, they there received the horsemen, and warded their darts; yet many for fear fell into the river, so the Romanes slew there 13000. and the rest not able to resist, cast themselves into the river; which were an infinite number: also the Romanes took 2000. and 200. men alive, and a huge boory of Sheepe, Asses, Camels, and

A and Oxen. This massacre though it was no greater then the former, yet it seemed to the Jews far greater, because that many all over the countrey flying were killed, and Jordan was so filled with dead carcases, that none could passe over it: and also the lake Asphaltites was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of divers rivers. Placidus having so good successe, went into the towns and villages adjoyning, and took Abila, Julias, Besemoth, and all the towns even unto the lake Asphaltites, and placed in them garrisons of them that fled unto him: and afterward preparing ships and furnishing them with souldiers, he pursued them that were fled by water, and overcame them: and so all the countrey beyond Jordan yeelded unto the Romanes, and even unto Machæron all places were by them conquered.

CHAP. IIII.

How certain towns were taken, and the description of Jericho.

This time came news of the troubles in Gallia, and how that Vindex together with the nobility of that countrey had revolted from Nero, whereof we have made mention in another place. This news caused Vespasian to be more earnest to end the warres of the Jews: for even then he foresaw the civill warres that ensued, and the danger of the whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of those troubles end the wars in the East part of the world, that then Italy was not in so much danger. But winter hindring him, he in the meantime placed garrisons in all townes and villages about the whole countrey, and placed Decurions in every City, and repaired many places which he had before destroyed. And first of all he with his whole army that was at Cæsarea, went to Antipatris, and there having settled the estate of that city, after his abode there two daies, the third day he departed, spoiling and burning all the countrey: as also all the countrey about Thamnia the Toparchy, and so went into Lydda and Jamnia. But seeing that those two places submitted themselves unto him, leaving there such inhabitants as he thought good, he went thence unto Ammaus, and placing himself in the way to their Metropolitane Citie, he there entrenched his army, and then leaving the fifth legion there, he with the rest went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all places thereabout, as also the borders of Idumæa: but he reserved there certain Castles in fit places, and fortified them. And having taken two towns in the midst of Idumæa, to wit, Begabrian and Caphartopha, he slew there above ten thousand men, and took almost a thousand, and driving out the rest of the inhabitants, he left a great part of his army there, who made incursions and wasted all the high places thereabout: and he with the rest returned to Jamnia; and from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the inhabitants Mabortha, the second day of June he came into Corea: and pitching his tents there, the next day he came to Jericho, where one of his Captains named Trajan, met him with the souldiers he brought from beyond Jordan, which place he had conquered. But the multitude, before the Romanes came, fled from Jericho into the high countrey over against Jerusalem, and many that staid behinde were there slain. So he found the city desolate, being situate in a Plain under a great mountain that is barren, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the Northside unto the borders of Scythopolis, and on the South unto the borders of Sodom and the lake of Asphaltites. It is all rockie and not inhabited, because it beareth no fruit. Over against this neer Jordan is situate a huge mountain, beginning on the North side at Julias, and reaching unto Bacra on the South, which is the limits of Petra a City of Arabia. In this place is that that is called the mountain of Iron, reaching unto the countrey of the Moabites.

The countrey between these two mountains is called the great field, reaching from the village Gennabara unto the lake of Asphaltites, being in length two hundred and thirty furlongs, and in breadth a hundred and twenty, and in the midst it is divided by the river Jordan. There are also two lakes of contrary natures, Asphaltites and Tiberias; for one of them is salt and barren, but that of Tiberias sweet and fertill. This Plain in summer time is burned with the heat of the sunne, and the aire is infected in all places thereabouts, save onely about those which adjoyne to Jordan: and this is the cause that the Palme trees that grow about the river side do flourish most, and are more fertill then the rest. Neere unto Jericho there is a large great fountain, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, and runneth with a great streame out of the ground neer unto the old City: which Iosue the sonne of Nun Generall of the Hebrews took by warre, the first of all that he took in the land of Canaan. It is reported that in the beginning, the waters of this fountain did destroy all fruits of the earth, and also made women be delivered before their time, and to infect all places with diseases, and the plague; and afterward by Helizanus the successor of Helias was made sweet and fertill: Who, being once courteously entertained by the inhabitants of Jericho, did so reward them and all the countrey for that their kindnesse: and going unto the fountain he cast a pitcher full of salt into the water; and hard by lifting up his hands to heaven, and tempering with the fountain water certain sweet waters, he prayed God to qualifie the rage thereof, to make it flow with more sweet streams: and besought God to give a better aire unto the fountain, which both might cause plenty of fruits, and also of children unto the inhabitants: and that the water might have the vertue to make women fertill, so long as they persist in piety. After these prayers, with his hands he altered the fountain according to the knowledge he had: and from that time, this fountain which before was the cause of famine and sterilitie, was now the cause of plenty and fertility. And so it watereth the ground, that where a little of it cometh, it doth more good then all the other waters which lye long upon it: and so they that water their grounds but a little with it, receive much fruits; and they that water their grounds with it much, do not receive them in that measure; yet it watereth a greater compasse of ground then other fountains: and in length it runneth thorow a Plain seventie furlongs long, and twenty broad. There are most pleasant and goodly Orchards, and many sorts of Palme trees growing by brooks sides, which are divers in the taste of their fruits; the fattest whereof being pressed, do yeeld a juyce like hony, nothing inferiour to other hony: yet there is great store of hony in that countrey, and the juyce of balme, which is more precious then all fruits growing. There grow also Cypres trees and Myrobolans: so that one may justly call that part of the earth divine, where what fruit soever is most deare and precious, is in most abundance. Also in all other fruits it surpasseth all countries in the world: for it multiplieth and increaseth all things sooner there. The cause hereof I judge to be the pleasant waters and warme nourishing aire, which as it were inviteth all things to spring up, and then encreaseth them: and the moisture causeth all things to take firme root; and also defendeth them from drought in summertime, when the countrey is vexed with such intolerable heats, that all things are as it were scorched, so that nothing then will grow; yet if they be watered with water drawn before Sunne-rise, by the blowing of a milde and temperate winde they are refreshed, and it receives a contrary nature: in winter time it is as it were lukewarme and temperate to them that go into it. The ayre of that place is so temperate, that when it snoweth in other parts of Judaea, and is extreme cold, the inhabitants in this place do onely weare a linen garment. This countrey is distant from Jerusalem a hundred and fifty furlongs, and threescore from Jordan, and all the ground betwixt it and Jerusalem is desert and stony, and so likewise between it and Jordan and Asphaltites, though it be lower ground then the other. Thus we have sufficiently declared the fertility of Jericho.

CHAP. V.

The description of the lake Asphaltites.

IT is worth the labour to describe the lake Asphaltites, which is salt and sterill; yet whatever is cast into it how weighty soever it be, it swimmeth above the water: so that one, though he would upon purpose, cannot scarcely sink unto the bottome. Vespasian coming thither to see it, caused some to be taken who could not swimme, and their hands to be bound behind them, and cast into the midst thereof, and all of them did swim aloft, being as it were borne up by the power of some spirit. Moreover it is admirable, how this lake thrice in every day changeth colour, and shineth diversly, according as the beames of the Sun do sundry waies fall upon it. And in many places it casteth up pieces of black bitumen, in greatnesse and shape like a bull without a head, and these float above the water. They that get their living upon this water, finding this bitumen that is thus gathered together, draw it to their boats, and it is so tough and clammy, that having filled their boats herewith, it is not easie for them to get them away, but their boat is as it were fastened: so it hangeth upon the rest of that masse of bituminous matter, til it be separated from it by the termes or urine of a woman. This bituminous matter is good for to close the rifts of ships, and also to cure many diseases. This lake is five hundred and eighty furlongs long, being extended unto Zoar which is in Arabia, and it is a hundred and fifty furlongs broad. Neere unto this lake is the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, sometime both fertill and rich: now all burnt, being (as it is reported) for the impiety of the inhabitants

A tants consumed with lightning and thunder. To be short, one may here behold as it were the signe and reliques of that fire, that by Gods appointment destroyed the place: for one may yet see as it were the fashion and tokens of five cities, and trees and fruits springing up in the ashes: which fruit to the eye seemeth like unto other fruits; but if you handle them, they fall into ashes and smoak. And so the report of the land of Sodom is known to be true to them that behold it.

*How Gerasa was destroyed: of NEROES death, and

*V*espasian desirous to besiege Jerusalem on every side, builded Castles at Jericho and Adida, and left there both the souldiers that came to assist him, and also Romanes with them. And he sent L. Annius to Gerasa, giving him many footmen, and part of his horsemen; who at the first assault took the City, and slew 1000 youngmen, who thought to have fled, and led whole families captive, giving the souldiers the spoile of their goods: and so firing their houses, he went to other places adjoining. They who were able fled, and the weaker sort who could not flye were slain; and whatsoever came in their way, they consumed it with fire. Thus all places both mountains and plains being wasted and oppressed with warres, the inhabitants living at Jerusalem had not whither to go, when they desired to flee from the Zealous by whom they were kept in. And they who were against the Romanes, were kept in themselves, the City being on every side inclosed and incompassed with the army.

After that Vespasian was returned unto Cæsarea, and with all his army purposing to go to Jerusalem, news was brought him that Nero was slain, having reigned thirteen yeers, and eight daies. Touching whom I will not recount how he did dishonour the Empire, committing the whole sway of all the Common-wealth unto two most wicked men, to wit, Nymphidius and Tigellinus, & of least worth amongst all the Libertines: and how he being taken by the treachery of these two men, was forsaken of all his Senators; and so fled onely with foure trusty Libertines into the suburbs, and there killed himself: and how that long time after, they that deposed him were punished for that offence: and how the warres ended in Gallia; and that Galba being created Emperour, returned to Rome out of Spain: and how he was accused by the souldiers, and by them killed in the market place, as one of base condition: and how Otho was declared Emperour, and led his souldiers against Vitellius his army: also Vitellius his broyles and his fight before the Capitoll: and how Antonius Primus, and Murius slew Vitellius, and so appeased the Germane troupes and civill wars: Of all these I have refused to speak, because I hope that both the Greeks and Romanes have written these things at large, yet I have briefly recapitulated all to continue my History.

Vespasian hath tidings of Neroes death.

After Vespasian heard these news of Nero, he deferred the siege of Jerusalem, expecting who should be created Emperour after him. And when he was certified that Galba reigned, he determined to do nothing; but lye quiet till such time as he should write unto him his minde, whether he would have him proceed in those warres against the Jews. And he sent unto him his sonne Titus both to salure him, and also to know his pleasure concerning the Jews. Likewise King Agrippa went with Titus for the same cause unto Galba. But as they were passing by Achaia with long ships in winter time, as the custome is, news was brought that Galba was slain, having reigned seven moneths and seven daies. After whom succeeded Otho, who governed the Empire three moneths. Agrippa not terrified with this alteration, still kept on his journey to Rome. But Titus (as God would have it) returned from Achaia unto Syria, and so to Cæsarea unto his father. They both were as it were in suspence what would ensue, and who should be Emperour, the Empire being so full of trouble: and so they neglected the warres against the Jews, fearing their own countrey, and therefore thinking it an unfit time to assault strangers.

Or all this the warre at Jerusalem was increased. For there was one Simon the son of Giora born in Gerasa, young in yeers, and inferiour to Iohn, who now already had gotten the dominion over the city: yet was he in strength & boldnesse more excellent then Iohn. This Simon being for this cause also driven out of the countrey of Acrabatena, where he was Governour by the means of Ananus the high Priest, he came to the thieves that seized upon Massada. This Simon, at his first coming, was so suspected by the thieves, that they onely permitted him and the women that came with him, to dwell in the lower part of the Castle, and they themselves kept the higher part: yet afterwards his manners and behaviour was such, that they put confidence in him: for he was their Captain alwaies when they went to spoile and rob any part of the countrey about Massada. So he feared not to perswade them to attempt greater matters: for being desirous of rule, after he heard that Ananus was dead, he departed into the high places of the countrey, and with the voice of a cryer promised and proclaimed, that all bondslaves that would follow him, should have their liberty, and all other should be richly rewarded; and so he gathered together all the wicked and desperate people in the countrey. And having now a large army, he robbed and spoiled all the towns and villages thereabout; and his number daily encreasing, he also now presumed to come into the plain countries: so that now cities stood in awe of him, & many Potentates now feared him for his strength & prosperous successe. And his army did not onely consist in thieves and slaves, but now many people of the countrey came unto him, reverencing him as their Prince & King. So they made excursions into the Toparchie of Acrabatena, and into the greater Idumæa. For he had fortified a town called Nain wal'd about, which he used for his defence like a castle. And in the valley cal'd Pharan he made many caves, and found many already made, and in these caves he kept his treasure, and the booties he got: also all fruits of the earth that he robbed and stole, there he laid up in store; as also munition for divers companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furnished with men and munition, he would go to Jerusalem. The Zealous fearing this, and desirous to prevent him whom they every day did see encrease his number, and to grow more potent against them; they armed many of their company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly incountred them, and gave them so sharp a battell, that he slew many of them in fight; and forced the rest to retire themselves into the town: yet having men sufficient, he would not besiege the town; but first of all he purposed to subdue Idumæa, and so accompanied with 20000. armed men, he hastened towards the borders thereof.

The Princes of Idumæa understanding this, presently assembled five and twenty thousand armed men: and leaving at home sufficient garrisons to defend their countrey against the incursion of the Sicarii, which held the fortresse of Massada, they accompanied with this train, went out and expected Simons coming into the borders of their country, where having met him they joyned battell; and fought a whole day, yet neither party got the victory. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumæans home. Not long after Simon with a greater army then before, assaulted the borders of their countrey, and pitching his tents in a village called Thecue, he sent one of his companions named Eleazar, to them that kept the Castle Herodium not far from that place, to solicit them to yeeld it unto him. The garrison there presently received him into the Castle, not knowing the cause of his coming. But so soon as he began to perswade them to treason, they all pursued him with their drawn swords: and he not having any place to flie unto, cast himself from off the Castle wall into the valley underneath, and so presently he died. The Idumæans something fearing Simons forces, before they would offer him battell, thought it best to espie what number of men he had: to effect which busines, one Iacob a ruler amongst them offered himself, meaning indeed to betray his country to Simon. So departing from Olurus where the Idumæans forces were assembled, he went unto Simon, and first of all promised him to betray his country unto him, receiving of him an oath, that for reward of this deed he should alwaies be next in dignity unto Simon himself, and so he presently promised to help to subdue all Idumæa. For this cause he was welcome to Simon and feasted liberally, and had great promises if he performed that which he offered: and then returned unto the Idumæans; and fained that Simons army was farre greater then indeed it was. And so at last terrifying the Governours of his country, and the people, he by little and little perswaded them to receive Simon, and without any more fight yeeld unto

A unto him the whole sovereignty over them. Jacob, studying to bring this his purpose to passe, privily sent messengers to Simon, willing him to come with his forces, and promising him to subdue the Idumæans for him, which also he did. For when Simons army drew neer, he first of all got upon his horse, and together with his associates that were partakers of his treason, he fled to the enemy. Then fear fell on the Idumæans, and every one without any more ado departed home. Thus Simon against his own expectation entred Idumæa without blood-shed: and first of all assaulting a little village called Chebron, upon a sudden he took it, and in it an exceeding great bootie, a great quantitie of corn, and many fruits, all which he carried away. The inhabitants report, that this Chebron is not onely more ancient then all cities of that Land, but also then Memphis in Ægypt: for they affirm it to have been built 2000. and 300. years since. They also say, that this was the place where Abraham the father of the Jews dwelt, after he forsook Mesopotamia, and that his posterity departed from hence to Ægypt. And of this there are yet monuments in the city, richly wrought in fine marble. Six furlongs from the town there is an exceeding great Turpentine tree, which they affirm to have endured ever since the creation of the world untill this day.

Simon having obtained this place, from hence he invaded all Idumæa, and not onely robbed and spoiled all towns and cities thereof, but also he wasted and destroyed many territories: for besides his army, there followed him 40000; so that he could not finde victuals sufficient for such a multitude. Moreover, besides this calamitie that he brought upon Idumæa, he exercised great crueltie and outrage upon the countrey, and so caused a greater spoil therein. And like as after locusts the trees and woods where they have been are left without leaves: so wheresoever Simon had been, all the countrey from whence he came he left desolate. And either by fire or overthrowing it by flammating places where he came, or else by treading upon it with the feet of his armie, or by devouring such as they found, they left nothing standing nor growing either in field or town: and onely by passing thorow fertile places, he made the fields harder then barren ground; and left no signe in places which he had destroyed, that ever they had been tilled.

Hereat the Zealous were again moved, yet durst they not fight with him in open field: but placing ambushes in the way he was to passe, they took Simons wife, and many of her servants, and so came again into the citie, rejoycing as though they had taken Simon himself. D For they perswaded themselves, that Simon would presently, laying arms apart, come in humble wise and intreat them to restore unto him his wife. But Simon was not moved with compassion for the losse of his wife, but with fury: and coming to the walls of Jerusalem, like a cruell beast that had been wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he killed and slew all he met. And taking them that went out of the City to gather herbs and wood, he caused them to be whipped to death, whether they were young or old: and this crueltie seemed onely wanting in him, that he did not eat the flesh of the dead bodies. Also he took many and cut of their hands, and so sent them into the City, thereby to terrifie his enemies, and to recall the people from the Zealous: and bad them tell the citizens, that except they presently restored his wife unto him, he swore by God who governed all, that he would break down their walls, and use all that he found in the Citie after that fashion, and that he would spare no age, nor respect the innocent more then the guilty. These his threats did not onely terrifie the people, but also the Zealous, insomuch that they sent him his wife again; and so his anger being something asswaged, he ceased a while from daily slaughter.

CHAP. VIII.

OF GALBA, OTHO, VITELLIUS and VESPASIAN.

F NOT onely in Judæa, but also in Italy at this time were civill warres: for Galba was slain in the midst of the market, after whom Otho was created Emperour, and fought against Vitellius, who affected the Empire, whom the Germane legions had elected: So the battell being fought neer unto Bebrias, a town in Gallia Cisalpina, the first day Otho got the victory against Valens and Cacina, the Generals of Vitellius his army. But the day following they overcame Otho: and so many being slain on both parts, and news being brought that Vitellius his army had gotten the victorie, Otho being at Brixels slew himself, when he had ruled the Empire three moneths and two dayes. Then Othos souldiers came unto Vitellius his Captains, and joyned with them, and so Vitellius came to Rome with his army. In the mean time Vespasian the fifth day of June departed from Cæsarea, and went unto those parts of Judæa which were yet unconquered: and first first of all he went into the high countreys, and subdued the two Toparchies of Acrabatenā and Gophnitis, and after them two towns called Bethel and Ephrem, and placed garrisons in them, and so went to Jerusalem, killing many that he found in the way, and he took many captives. And one of his Captains called Cerealis, with a part of horse and footmen, wasted all the higher Idumæa, and in the way as he went, he took Caphetra a Castle, and burnt it, and besieged another called Capharis, enclosed with a strong wall: for the which cause he deemed that he should have made long abode there: but contrary to his expectation, the inhabitants opened the gates unto him, and came and yeelded themselves, beseeching him to be good unto them. When he had overcome them, Cerealis went unto Hebron an ancient City, and set it on fire; this Hebron as I have already said, was situated upon the mountains, so farre from Jerusalem: and breaking into it by force, he slew all them that he found there, and fired the Citie. And having subdued all places, save onely three Castles, to wit, Herodium, Masfada, and Macheron, which were kept by the theeves, now onely Jerusalem remained to be conquered.

When Simon had received again his wife from the Zealous, he went into Idumæa, to rob and spoil that which he had left: and chasing the inhabitants up and down, at last he forced them to flie unto Jerusalem, and he himself followed them thither, and besieging the wals, he killed all the workmen he took, that returned out of the fields from their labour. Thus Simon without the city, was more terrible to the people then the Romanes; and the Zealous within the city crueller then them both, being incouraged and incited thereto by the counsell of the Galileans. For they had put Iohn in authority: and Iohn in reward thereof permitted all things to be done which they requested. There was no end of robbing and spoiling rich mens houses, and of slaughtering both of men and women; and now to injure any person was a pastime. And having with blood-shed obtained their prey in securitie, and without all fear after they had gotten what they liked, they now began to lust after women: yea, they became themselves effeminate through luxuriousnesse, dressing their hair, and clothing themselves in womens apparell; and they anointed themselves with sweet ointments, that their beauty might be pleasing, and alluring, their eyes wanton-like; they now did not onely imitate the attire of women, but also their impudency, and became so shamelesse, that they now thirsted after unnaturall pleasures, as though they had kept a stews, and so profaned the whole city with their execrable impurities. Yet though they did effeminate their faces, their hands were prone to blood-shed; and although they lived in ignominious maner, as people given over to pleasure, yet could they quickly become warriors, and under the habits of women drawing their swords, they did kill whomsoever they met. Whosoever escaped Iohns hands, Simon crueller, murdered; and whosoever escaped the tyrannie within the citie, was slain by the tyrant without. So now there was no way to flie unto the Romanes. Furthermore, the army of Iohn began to be divided, for all the Idumæans separated themselves from the other people, and there began a mutiny against the tyrant, partly envying his puissance, partly hating his crueltie. And so assaulting him, they slew many of the Zealous, and compelled the rest to flie into the Kings house, builded by Grapsa, father of Izata, King of Adiabena. The Idumæans also brake in thither with them, and drave them from thence into the Temple, and so seized upon Iohns treasure: for Iohn lived in that palace, and thither carried all his spoils. Then those Zealous that were disperfed in the city, came unto them that were in the Temple, and Iohn purposed to send them against the townsmen, and the Idumæans. But they feared not so much their forces, although they knew them to be the better warriors, as they did fear that now being desperate, they would steal out of the Temple in the night, and so slay them, and fire the citie. Wherefore assembling themselves, they deliberated with the Priests how to avoid their assaults: but it pleased God to turn their own counsell to be their destruction, and that they should provide a remedie of safetie, farre worse then death it self. For to depose Iohn, they devised to introduce Simon, and as it were to intreat yet another to tyrannize over them. So this counsell was thought best: and Matthias the Priest was sent unto Simon (whom before they stood in great fear of) now to request him to come into the city. With them also came such as had fled from Jerusalem, for fear of the Zealous, intreating him in like maner, because they desired to return to their wives and families. So he entred into the city proudly, promising them to be their Lord, and all the people cried with loud voices as he came into the Citie, that he was their preserver,

A preserver, and giver of life and libertie. Being now within the Citie, presently he deliberated with them about him, to establish his dominion, thinking as well them that called him into the Citie, as those against whom he was called, his enemies. Then John and the Zealous with him, finding no way to come out of the Temple, and having lost all that he had in the Citie (for Simon and his followers at his entrance took all that belonged unto him) began now to despair of his safetie. And Simon, being assisted by the Citizens, assaulted the Temple, and the Zealous placing themselves upon the porches, and in towers of defence, made resistance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zealous were upon the higher ground on the right hand, and so had the vantage against Simon. And although by reason of the place wherein they were, they prevailed against Simon; yet they builded foure high towers, that from thence they might shoot darts and arrowes against Simons army. One of these towers they built upon the East side of the Temple; another on the North; the third upon a place opposite to the lower part of the towne; and the fourth tower they built upon the top of the place called Pastophorium, where one of the Priests do use to stand before the Sunne-set, and at break of day, to signifie unto the people with the sound of the trumpet the beginning of the Sabbath, declaring thereby unto them, sometime holy daies, and afterward that they might go about their businesse. In these towers they placed all kinde of Engines to cast stones, and men with slings. Then Simon, perceiving many of his souldiers languish, was more remisse in his businesse: yet when his number increased, he came neerer: for as farre off many of his men were slain with the shot of those Engines.

CHAP. X.

How VESPASIAN was elected Emperour.

This time the Romanes were in great danger: for Vitellius was now arrived out of Germany with his army, bringing beside them an infinite multitude with him, so that his army was so great, that the place appointed for souldiers could not contain it: insomuch that his army occupied all the whole citie, and every house was filled with armed men. And they beholding the Romanes wealth greater then ever they saw any, and admiring their abundance of gold and silver, not able to contain themselves, they began to robbe and kill whomsoever that sought to withstand them. And this was the estate of the affairs in Italy. Vespasian having wasted all about Jerusalem, returned unto Cæsarea, and there he understood of the troubles at Rome, & how Vitellius was Emperour. Hereat, though he knew as well to obey as to be obeyed, yet was he moved to indignation, and disdained to call him Lord, who had as it were invaded and usurped the Empire, being destitute of a Ruler. And much grieved hereat, he could not conceale his griefe, nor follow warres against strangers, his own countrey being so endangered. But the distance between him and Rome did as much repress him, as anger incited him to seek revenge: for he considered that fortune might cause many alterations before he could get to Rome especially it being winter: and so he sought to bridle his wrath which daily increased. But his Captains with the souldiers did now openly consult of a change, and with indignation did exclaime against the souldiers at Rome, who lived in pleasure, and never heard so much as the report of warre; and that notwithstanding this, it was lawfull for them to create whom they pleased Emperour, and under hope of gaine, they disposed of the Common-wealth at their own pleasure: where they on the contrary side, having overpast so many labours and dangers, still continuing in arms till now, waxed old and gray-headed, and did suffer authoritie due unto themselves, to be executed by others; when notwithstanding they had amongst them one who deserved the Empire, more then any one; and what recompence could they ever after make him? or what occasion could they finde hereafter to shew themselves gratefull to him for the benefits by him received, if they did now omit this occasion?

Vitellius encamps his army in Rome.

The Captains consult with the souldiers openly of a change.

And they thought that Vespasian was so much more worthy of the Empire then Vitellius, by how much they, who created Vitellius Emperour, were in very many respects much inferiour unto them. For (said they) we have endured no lesse toyle then those that came out of Germany: neither are we lesse valiant then they, who bring a Tyrant with them out of Germany. And that no body would resist Vespasian: for the Senate and the people of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his unsatiable lust, then Vespasians chastitie and temperance; nor a cruell Tyrant, rather then a good and courteous Emperour; nor the son should by them be elected Emperour, before the father. For true valour in an Emperour is a great defence of peace. Therefore if the Empire were due to aged experience, they had Vespasian; if to valiant youth, they had amongst them Titus: and that they might reap commodity by both their ages: And that they would not onely assist him with the forces of the Empire having there three three legions, beside the help of the Kings; but also all the East part of Europe was out of Vitellius his danger. Moreover, they had in Italy some that would assist Vespasian, to wit, his brother and his sonne, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many young men to follow him, and the other was now made Prefect of the City, which was no small step to attain unto the Empire. Lastly, it might so fall out that the Senate would declare him Emperour, whom now the souldiers, being as it were their conserver, had elected.

This was first talked amongst the companies of the souldiers: at last, exhorting one another thereto, they came and saluted Vespasian by the name of Emperour, and requesting him now to preserve the Empire, being in great danger to be lost. Albeit Vespasian had alwaies been carefull for the good of the Common-wealth, yet he refused to be Emperour: deeming himself indeed to have deserved it; yet he rather did chuse to live a private life, wherein was security, then in the height of fortune and honour with perpetuall danger. The captains were more earnest because he refused it; and the souldiers flocked about him with drawn swords, threatening his death, except he would consent to live as he deserved: yet long time striving to avert this their determination, being loth to be Emperour; at last, seeing he could not avoid it, he accepted their offer.

The description of Egypt.

MVitellius* and the rest of the Captaines that had incited him to the Empire, together with the whole army, cryed aloud, willing Vespasian to lead them against their common enemy. But Vespasian thought it best, first to settle the estate of Alexandria, knowing that Ægypt for the supply of corne was the greatest and best part of the Empire: which if he once were sure of, he hoped that although Vitellius were stronger then he, yet he could bring him under perforce, because the people would not endure that for his sake the Citie should be famisht: which would have come to passe, except they had supply of corn out of Ægypt.

Moreover, he desired to joyn to himself those two legions that were at Alexandria. He also thought that that countrey might be a defence and refuge for him, if any adverse fortune should betide him: for the countrey is not easily to be entred by an army, and the Sea-coasts have no havens nor harbours to receive ships. On the West it bordereth upon the dry and barren part of Lybia; on the South, upon the frontiers which separate Syene from Æthiopia, and the streames of Nilus not navigable; on the East it bordereth upon the red Sea, which extends it self even unto the Citie Copton; on the North it is defended with Syria, and the Ægyptian Sea, wherein there is no haven. Thus Ægypt is strong on every side, and reacheth in length 2000. furlongs from Pelusium to Syene: and from Plinthine to Pelusium they sayle 3000. and 600. furlongs. And Nilus is navigable even unto the town Elephantine.

Further, by reason of the downfalls of Nilus, also the haven at Alexandria is dangerous to come unto in time of peace: for the entrance into it is very straight; and beside that, the way goes not directly on, but is made crooked by great stony rockes, and the left side is compassed artificially, but on the right side is the Ile Pharus, having a tower upon it exceeding great: so that the light in it is seen of the Mariners 300. furlongs off, that long before they come neer it, they may provide to bring their ships in with safetie.

This Ile is inclosed with most huge wals made by art, against which the Sea beating, and so returning back againe, maketh the entrance into the haven more dangerous. Yet this haven within is very safe, and 30. furlongs long: so that whatsoever that countrey wants, it is brought them into that haven, and whatsoever aboundeth amongst them which other nations need, is carryed from thence all over the whole world. So that Vespasian did not unadvisedly seeke to establish the estate of Alexandria, and dispose thereof for his own profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherefore presently he sent letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was Governour of Alexandria and Ægypt, and told him of the souldiers resolution: and how that he, seeing he could not avoid it but that he was forced to take upon him the Empire, now requested him to help him in what he could. Alexander, receiving Vespasians letters, agreed willingly thereto, and presently caused his army and the people also to sweare unto Vespasian: which both of them did willingly, understanding Vespasians vertue by reason that he governed so neer them. And so he having now leave, prepared all things to furnish himself like an Emperour, and to be received like a Prince.

Tis incredible how quickly this news was carried into all partes of the world, to wit, that Vespasian was declared Emperour in the East, and now all cities rejoyced and made triumphs, and offered sacrifices for his fortunate successe. Moreover, the legions in Mesia and Pannonia, who not long before were revolted from Vitellius by reason of his cruelty, did now willingly swear obedience to Vespasian. Vespasian returned by Berytum to Caesarea, where many Embassadors came unto him, bringing him Crowns, and applauding and rejoycing at his good fortune, who came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. There was also present Muricanus, governour of those parts, who brought tydings how joyfully all the people received him for their Emperour, and how that they had all sworn obedience unto him. So all things falling out prosperously on Vespasian's side, and fortune for the most part inclining as he desired, he began to think with himself that it was Gods providence that he was made Emperour, and that a just destiny had brought him to that estate. And so he called to minde all tokens and signes (as there had happened many, which did foretell that he should be Emperour) and among the rest, he remembered that which Ioseph had told him, who, Nero being yet alive, presumed to call him Emperour, and so he admired the man whom as yet he kept in hold. And calling Muricanus and the rest of his friends together, first of all he told them how valiant Ioseph had been, and what ado he had to win Jotapata, only because of him; and then his prophecies, which at that time he esteemed onely fables, framed upon fear; yet now time and event had proved them true. Affirming it an undecent thing, that he, who had been the foreteller of his exaltation, and had been a messenger to him from God, should still continue in bonds like a captive, and be left in adversity. So calling for Ioseph, he commanded him to be let loose. This fact of his made the Captains under him, hope for great reward at his hands, seeing he had been so kinde to a stranger. Thus being there present, said, It is meet, O father, that as you acquit Ioseph from captivity, so you also take away the shame of that which he hath already endured. For if we do not onely untie his chains, but also break them in sunder, he shall be as though he had never been in bondage: for this is the manner used for redresse, when any one being guiltlesse is committed to bonds. Vespasian hereto agreed: and so one came with an ax, and hewed his chains in pieces. Thus was Ioseph rewarded for his prophecy, and so hereafter he was esteemed worthy to be beleaved.

of VITELLIUS his death and manners.

When Vespasian had answered the Embassadors, and justly disposed of all the Rulers of his army according to every ones merit, he now came to Antiochia, and there did deliberate whither to go first, and it seemed best to him to go to Rome, rather then to Alexandria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet and firm, but Rome was troubled by Vitellius. Wherefore he sent Muricanus into Italy, with many footmen and horsemen: who fearing to go by Sea, went thorow Cappadocia and Phrygia, for it was winter time. Now Antonius Primus, who was governour of Mesia, brought from thence the third legion remaining there, and came to warre against Vitellius. Vitellius sent Cacinius to meet him with a great army: who departing from Rome, presently met with Antonius at Cremona, a town of Gallia, situate upon the confines of Italy; and there beholding the discipline and multitude of the enemies, durst not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to flee, he plotted treason, and so calling unto him the Centurions and Tribunes under his government, he perswaded them to go and joyn with Antonius, debasing Vitellius his power, and extolling Vespasian: affirming the first to have onely the bare name of the Emperour, and the last to have also all vertues meet for an Emperour. Moreover, that so it would be better for them to do that of their own accord, which otherwise they should be compelled to, and seeing themselves already overcome in number, so also now willingly prevent all danger. For Vespasian was able without their assistance to subdue all the rest: but Vitellius was not able with their help to keep that he had: speaking much to this effect, he perswaded them to all that which he would have done. And so with his whole army joyned with Antonius.

that Vitellius should get the upper hand who sent them against Antonius, drew their swords, and would have slain Cæcinnæ; And had done it, had not the Tribunes come and entreated them to the contrary: wherefore they did not kill him, but kept him bound, meaning to send him to Vitellius as a traitor. Primus Antonius hearing this, came with his army and assaulted them who were revolted from him, and they a while resisted; yet at last, forced to retire, they fled to Cremona. And Primus, accompanied with his men, prevented their course, and so slew most of them before the city, and afterward setting upon the rest, gave his souldiers the spoil of it, wherein many Merchants of other countreys, and many townsmen were slain, and all Vitellius army, 30000. and 200. men: and Antonius lost in that battell 4000. and 700. of those whom he brought with him out of Moesia. And delivering Cæcinnæ from prison, he sent him to bear news hereof to Vespasian: who coming unto him, was praised for his fact, and greatly honoured above his expectation, in reward of his treason.

Sabinus, who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly rejoyced, and took courage: and gathering together the companies of the watchmen in the night time, he took the Capitoll, and in the morning many of the Nobles came and joyned with him: and Domitianus his brothers sonne, who was a great cause and help to obtain the victory. Vitellius little esteemed Primus; but he was angry against Sabinus and those that had revolted with him: and as it were naturally thirsting after the blood of the Nobility, he set all the army he brought out of Germanie with him, to assault the Capitoll, where many valiant deeds were shewed on both parts: and at last, the Germanes, being most in number, got the Capitoll hill. And Domitian with many brave noble men, as it were by Gods providence, escaped safe, the rest of the multitude were there slain. And Sabinus was carried to Vitellius, and there by his commandment put to death: the souldiers, taking away all the gifts and treasure in the Temple, set it on fire. The day after came Antonius, and Vitellius his souldiers met him: and fighting in three severall places of the Citie, they were all slain. Then Vitellius came drunk out of his palace, and being full gorged with delicate meat, he was drawn thorow the midst of the people, and after many contumelies slain, having reigned eight moneths, and five dayes: who if he had lived longer, I think verily the Empire had not been sufficient to have maintained his gluttony. There were slain above 50000. of other people. And this was done the third day of October. The day after, Mucianus with his army came and entred Rome, and repressed the souldiers of Antonius, who still fought about in every place for Vitellius souldiers and many other of his favourites, and slew whom they thought good, not examining any matter by reason of their furie: and bringing out Domitian, he declared to the people that he was to govern the City till his father came. The people being delivered from fear, proclaimed Vespasian Emperour, and made feasts and triumphs both under one, for his establishing in the Empire, and for joy that Vitellius was deposed.

CHAP. XIII.

How TITUS was sent by his father against the Jews.

When Vespasian came unto Alexandria, news were brought unto him what was done at Rome. And Embassadors came unto him from all parts of the world to congratulate him. And although next after Rome this citie was the greatest in the world, yet was it scarcely able to receive the people that came thither unto him. Vespasian now being established Emperour of all the world, and the Common-wealth of the Romanes being contrary to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think upon the reliques of Judæa. And so he himself, winter being ended, prepared to go to Rome, and in the mean time he hastened to dispose of all things at Alexandria. Moreover, he sent his sonne Titus with certain chosen men to destroy Jerusalem. Who departed from Alexandria to Nicopolis by land, which is distant from it 20. furlongs, and there he did ship his men, and so sayled along the river Nilus by Medensia to Thumin, and there landing his men, he came to the city called Tanis. And the second place he rested in was the city Heraclea, and the third Pelusium: and there resting, and refreshing his souldiers two dayes space, the third day he past the borders of Pelusium, and having gone one dayes journey thorow the wilderness, he pitched his tents at the Temple of Iupiter Cassian, and the next day at Ostracine, where there is no water, but all that the inhabitants do use, they bring from other places. After that, he rested at Rhinocolura, and from thence in four dayes he came to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria, and the fifth day he lodged at Gaza, and from thence to Ascalon, and so to Jamnia and Joppe, from whence he went to Caesarea, purposing to gather the rest of the souldiers there.

CHAP. I.

Of the three sorts of sedition in Ierusalem.

ITUS being thus come out of Ægypt by the desert into Syria, he departed from thence unto Cæsarea: for there he purposed to set his army in order. And whilest yet he was with his father Vespasian at Alexandria, disposing of the Empire that God had given him, it happened that the sedition at Ierusalem was divided into three parts, whereof one fought against another: and one may say, it was a good turn that they were so equally divided. We have already sufficiently declared who were the Authors and beginners of the faction of the Zealous, whose tyranny over the Citie was the ruin thereof: and one may well call this a sedition raised out of a sedition; which, like a cruell and savage beast in penury and want of others, turned his crueltie against his own bowels. So Eleazar the sonne of Simon, who was the first that in the Temple divided the Zealous from the people, faining himself to be displeased with that which Iohn every day did; yet in truth, for that he envied that a more tyrant of later time then himself should be his ruler, desirous to obtain the principallitie, and make himself mightie, he revolted from the rest: and with him Judas the sonne of Chelcias, and Simon the sonne of Ezron, two of the most potent amongst them. Besides them, was also Ezechias the sonne of Chobarus a Nobleman, and all these had many of the Zealous following them: and getting in possession the Day and night nothing could be heard save onely the noise of them that fought one against another; yet the lamentable cries of them that lived in perpetuall fear was farre more miserable, who every day had new causes and occasions of sorrow given them; yet durst they not publikely lament, for fear, and so not daring to shew their grief, they secretly sorrowed, and now no man observed any reverence to them that were alive amongst them, nor took any care to bury the dead. The cause of both which was, that every man despaired of himself. For whosoever were not joyned with the seditious, grew to be carelesse of all things, as making account presently to dye a thousand deaths. But the seditious gathering the dead bodies upon heapes, continued their fighting, and trod upon them; and as it were encouraging themselves by the dead under their feet, they became more cruell, still devising one pernicious practice or other, and presently executing whatsoever they devised without any commiseration, omitting no way to murder, and leaving no tyranny unattempted: so that Iohn abused the holy things of the Temple to make Engines of warre. For before time when the Priests and people had determined to underprop the Temple and build it twentie cubites higher, King Agrippa with great cost and charges brought them very goodly timber sufficient for their purpose from mount Libanus. And this worke being prevented by warres, Iohn took them, and seeing them fit for his purpose, he erected a tower to fight against those that assaulted him from off the Temple; which he built along the wall over against the Chapter house, that standeth on the West side of the Temple: for he could build it in no other place, by reason that all other places were filled with itaires. And having thus impiously provided Engines, he hoped hereby to destroy his enemies. But God shewed his labour to be in vaine, and before he could prevaile against them, he brought the Romanes against the Citie.

TITUS being now to go into the country of the enemy, caused all those that came to help him, to march in the foremost place: after whom followed they that were to mend the wayes, and to pitch the tents: and after them they which carried the baggage of the Rulers and Governors of his army, and with them, the armed souldiers. Next after these came Titus himself accompanied with chosen men, and with him many that bare his colours: next, the horsemen going immediately before the Engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certaine chosen men, and their companies followed. After them the Eagle with many other Ensignes: and the trumpets went before them. The cruelty of the seditious in Jerusalem.

John made use of the wood, that was kept for holy uses, to make engines of.

For after that Titus had now gathered together part of his army, and by writing appointed the rest to meet him at Jerusalem, he departed from Caesarea, having three legions that lately under the conduct of his father Vespasian had wasted all Judæa, and the twelfth legion that sometime under Cestius were overcome, and put to flight by the Jews: who though they were otherwise valiant enough, yet they desired to fight against the Jews to revenge themselves for that disgrace. Titus commanded the fifth legion to meet him at Jerusalem, and go by Emmaus, and that the tenth legion should march by Jericho: the rest he took with himself accompanied with the Kings forces that came to help him, having now more help then before, and many also out of Syria. Titus also brought men with him to supply the number that was wanting, being sent by Vespasian with Mutianus into Italy: for he brought two thousand chosen men from the legions at Alexandria, and three thousand followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his chiefest friend, and one next him in most authoritie, who before was Governour of Ægypt, and as then thought a fit man worthy to be Governour of the army; for that he was the first that did entertain the Emperour being new elected, who faithfully joyned with Vespasian, though yet he knew not what successe he should have: and he was present with him in all his affaires as his chiefest Counsellor, renowned both for his wisdom and experience.

CHAP. II.

How TITUS went to Jerusalem to see their strength, and how he was in great danger.

F TITUS being now to go into the countrey of the enemy, caused all those that came to help him, to march in the foremost place: after whom followed they that were to mend the wayes, and to pitch the tents: and after them they which carried the baggage of the Rulers and Governors of his army, and with them, the armed souldiers. Next after these came Titus himself accompanied with chosen men; and with him many that bare his colours: next, the horsemen going immediately before the Engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certaine chosen men, and their companies followed. After them the Eagle with many other Ensignes: and the trumpets went before them. And after them followed the army marching six in a rank: then the multitude of servants that followed every legion did drive their baggage before them: lastly, came the hirelings and those that were appointed to guard them. Marching in such comely and warlike manner, as the Romanes are wont, he came by Samaria into Gophna, which place was already conquered by his father, and then also was under the custody of the Romane garrisons. And staying there one night, he departed from thence the next day: and after a dayes journey he pitched his tents in a place, which in the Jews language is called Acanthonaulon, that is, the valley of thornes, neer unto a village named Gabath Saul, which signifieth the valley of Saul, which is almost thirtie furlongs from Jerusalem. From thence accompanied with 600. chosen horsemen, he went to Jerusalem, to view how strong it was, and of what courage the Jews were, to see if peradventure at sight of him they would yeeld without any further warre, for feare. For Titus understood (and it was true) that the people desired peace, but they were oppressed by the seditious, and so durst not attempt any thing, being not able to encounter or resist the Rebels. Titus riding along the high way that went straight to the wals, saw no man all the way: but turning aside towards the tower Psephinos with his horsemen, an infinite number presently issued out by the towers of women, at a gate opposite to Helens tombe, and brake his ranke of horsemen into two parts, and opposed themselves, hindring those horsemen that were yet in the high way, to come and joyne with the rest that had crost the way, and so did single out Titus accompanied onely with a few men. So he could go no further for the ditch of the towne wall on one side, and for the garden pales on the other side: and there was no hope for him to returne unto his souldiers, the enemies being between him and home. And many of his souldiers not knowing their Generall to be in any danger, but supposing him to have been amongst them still, fled away. Titus seeing that he had onely his own valour to trust unto, turned his horse against his enemies, and with a loud voice exhorted his followers to do the like, and so he brake violently into the midst of them, hasting to get unto his company. It was evident at that time that God giveth the victory, and hath a particular care of Kings and Princes and Emperours. For notwithstanding that an infinite number of darts and arrowes were shot at Titus, and he had no armour at all (for as we have already said, he came to espy, and not to fight) yet had he not one wound but all past him, as though purposely every one had striven to have mist him. But Titus with his sword made way, and cut many upon the face that opposed themselves against him, and so they falling down, he with his horse past over them. The Jews seeing Titus his valour, cried and exhorted one another to set upon him, but whithersoever he turned, the Jews fled, and would not abide by it: likewise those souldiers that were in the like danger with him, came of either side him and behinde him. For no man had any hope to save his life, but onely by making themselves way with Titus, before they were so enclosed and oppressed. So, of two of the most valiant amongst them one was slain, and his horse likewise: the other was slain, and his horse taken by the Jews. And Titus with the rest of his followers came safe into the camp. And the Jews getting the first victory, rashly took courage, and that encouragement being of moment, made them very confident a long time after.

CHAP. III.

Soon as the legion that was to passe by Ammaus, was joyned to the rest of the army that night, Cesar presently the next morning removed, and came to Scopos, where he might perfectly view the Citie and the Temple on the North part, where the ground adjoyning unto the City is very low, and is properly called Scopos, being distant seven furlongs from the Citie: and there Titus commanded two legions to encamp themselves, and the fifth legion to retire three furlongs off, to the intent that the souldiers who were wearied with travelling all night, might entrench themselves without fear or danger. No sooner had they begun their work, but presently the tenth legion came, who were to passe by Jericho, which Vespasian had already subdued, and had placed there a garrison. This legion was commanded to encamp six furlongs from Jerusalem, neer mount Olivet, which is opposite to the East part of the Citie, and is enclosed with a deep valley called Cedron. This great and huge army so suddenly arriving, presently stayed the warres within the Citie: and these three sects of seditious people beholding with admiration the Romanes camp, became friends, and made agreement amongst themselves. They began also to question one with another, what they caused them to suffer themselves to be enclosed with three wals, to their prejudice and losse of their lives: and seeing such preparation of warres towards, that they should be as it were beholders of that which was done,

A done, keeping themselves quiet, and not providing to resist the assaults of their enemies: and some cried, We are onely valiant against our selves, and we by our sedition massacring one another, shall betray our Citie into the Romanes hands.

Thus they being assembled together, exhorted one another: and presently arming themselves, they issued out of the Citie, and assaulted the tenth legion, and with a huge cry set upon the Romanes that were entrenching themselves in the valley. The Romanes being every one appointed to do some businesse for the furtherance of that work, and for that cause the most of them having laid down their weapons (for they thought the Jews durst not have made any excursions, and although they would, that yet they were hindred being at variance among themselves) they were troubled above measure, and presently leaving the work, some fled; many arming themselves to fight, were slain before they were prepared to resist.

B The multitude of the Jews was daily increased, because that at the first they got the upper hand, and notwithstanding their number was small, yet did they think themselves many: and so did the Romanes think them to be, because of their good fortune. The Romanes who were alwayes wont to observe military discipline and order, at that time by their sudden assaulting, were so troubled, that they observed no order, and so fled: yet whensoever they turned again upon them that followed them, they easily wounded the Jews, partly, because that they were so earnest, that they did not greatly seek to defend themselves, and also they did easily stay the Jews from pursuing them. Yet the number of them that pursued them still increasing, they were also more troubled, and so at last forced to forsake the field, and leave their tents: and the whole legion had been in greater danger, had not Titus having present news hereof speedily came and succoured them, and upbraiding their cowardlineffe recalled them from flight, who with them, and the chosen men he brought, encountering the Jews on one side, he slew many of them, and wounded divers, and put the rest to flight, and forced them into the valley. The Jews being now in the lower ground, and having endured much at the Romanes hands, since fortune frowned upon them, turned again, and having the valley between them, they fought with the Romanes. And thus the fight continued till the midst of the day.

A little after midday Titus guarding the rest with those that he brought to succour them, and placing others, to prevent the excursions of the Jews, he commanded the rest to entrench themselves in the top of the mountain. The Jews thought the Romanes had fled, and their sentinell upon their wals, making a signe unto them by shaking his garment up and down, a great multitude of them ranne so violently upon the Romanes, as though they had been savage beasts, so that none of their enemies were able to withstand them; but as though they had been stricken with some Engine, so all of them were diversly scattered and forced to flie into the mountain. But Titus in the midst of the side of the mountain remained alone, having but a few with him, notwithstanding his friends, who for the love they bare to their Emperour, stayed with him, and abode the danger, did earnestly perswade him to flie from the Jews, who desperately ranne upon their own deaths, and not to endanger himself for them, who ought rather to abide it then he: And that he should think upon his own estate, who was not a souldier, but Generall of them all, and Lord of the whole world, and that he should not abide when all others fled so fast, and in such danger. But he made as though he heard them not, and opposed himself against them that offered to assault him, striking them upon the faces, and killing them that made resistance, and he pursued them down the hill, and so forced them to retire. The Jews amazed at his valour, did not yet flie into the Citie, but avoided him on both sides, and fled into the valley: then again pursuing them that fled from them; yet Titus crossing them as they went, hindred their pursuit. In the mean time those that were encamping themselves above, seeing them beneath put to flight, were discouraged, and all fled, thinking that they were not able to resist the Jews, and imagining that Titus was likewise fled: for had they thought that he had stayed by it, they never would have

F forsaken their quarters, yet being now terrified they knew not wherefore, some fled one way, and some another without any order, till some seeing the Emperour in the midst of the battell, and fearing the mischance that might betide him, they with loud cries signified it unto the whole legion. Then the Romanes turning again for shame, and accusing themselves guilty of a great offence in forsaking their Emperour amidst such danger, came with all the violence they could use against the Jews, and driving them down the mountain, forced them to retire, yet the Jews fought flying, and seeing the Romanes to have the upper hand of them, because they were upon the higher ground, they departed into the valley. Titus assaulted them that were opposite against him, and so commanded the rest to go and finish their trenches. And he with those that before were with him to defend the workmen, did now also keep the Jews from molesting them. So if I may speak without flattery or envy, Caesar himself did twice preserve the whole legion from destruction, and gave the souldiers opportunitie to entrench themselves.

DVring the intermission of the forraine warres, they fell to their former sedition againe, which caused civill warres among them. And against the feast of unleavened bread, which is the 14. day of Aprill (for upon this day the Jews say that they were delivered out of the bondage of Egypt) Eleazar and his companions opened the gates, to the intent that all that would, might come in to adore and do their devotion. But John used this festivall day as a means to effect his deceit, and caused many of his company that were unknown, to enter in among the people with weapons under their garments, giving them charge when they were within, to get possession of the Temple: and so soon as they were within, they cast off their garments, and shewed themselves to be in armour. Presently a great tumult arose within the Temple: for all the people that were not of the sedition, thought themselves betrayed: and the Zealous thought this treason onely practised to prejudice them: and so leaving the gate which before they kept, and leaping down from the towers, they never offering to fight, fled unto the vaults about the Temple. And the people flocking about the Altar, and others who were driven into the Temple, were killed with clubs and swords, and so trodden upon. And many were slain upon private hatred, under pretence to be partakers with the enemies. And whosoever beforetime had offended any of those Traitors, he was put to death, as though he had been one of the Zealous. But they who had cruelly raged against the innocent, let the wicked have leisure to escape out of those caves, whereby they had no harme: and having gotten the inner part of the Temple, and all belonging thereunto, they did now more confidently then before fight against Simon: and thus the sedition that was before divided into three parts, was now brought onely into two. Titus being desirous to bring his army neerer the Citie, sent a certaine number of horsemen and foot, which he thought sufficient to hinder all excursions of the Jews from Scopos, and another company he sent to plaine all the grounds betwixt him and Jerusalem: who cutting down all hedges and pales, and fences, and wood (though they were fruit trees) filled the valleys and made it all plain ground: and hewing down all stones that standing up made the ground unequal, they plained all that ground from Scopos even unto Herods monument, which adjoynd to the lake of Serpents called sometime Bethora.

of the souldiers among the Romanes, contrary to
nance.

ABout this time the Jews devised this stratagem against the Romanes. The most courageous among the seditious people went out unto the places called the womens towers, and counterfeited themselves to be driven thither by them within the city that desired peace, and for that they feared the Romanes, they were come thither to hide themselves one behinde another: others standing on the walls, and counterfeiting themselves to be the Citizens, with loud cries desired peace, and a league of friendship, promising to set the citie gates open, and inviting the Romanes to enter: and crying thus they also cast stones against their countrey men before spoken of, as though they did drive them from the gates; and they made as though they would by force break thorow the people, and come to the gates, partly by force, partly by entreating the people to permit them. And making many offers to go unto the Romanes, they returned againe like men troubled in minde, and studying what to do. The Romane souldiers did not perceive their subtil meaning, who seeing the seditious ready to fall into their hands, that so they might punish them, and seeing the people (as they thought) ready to open the gates unto them, would in poste haste have gone unto the city. But Titus suspected some deceit coloured with this kinde, enviring him to enter, because he did not see any reason for it. For the day before, having by Ioseph offered them peace, he understood that their minds were farre from any peaceable cogitations: wherefore now he commanded the souldiers to keep their quarters and not to remove, yet some of them, appointed to work in the trenches, taking their weapons, ran unto the gates, and the Jews who seemed to be driven out of the citie at first fled; at last when

A when they came unto the gates of the towers, they enclosed the Romanes round about, and assaulted them upon their backs: and they that were upon the wals did cast all kinde of darts and stones upon them: so that they slew many, and wounded very many; for it was not easie to escape from the wals, others being behinde them, and offering them violence. Moreover, they were ashamed that their Captains had so offended, and in fear for their offence committed, both which caused them still to persevere in it. And after a long conflict receiving many wounds, and giving as many, at last that put them to flight that enclosed them, and so the Jews departed, and followed them to Herods monument, pursuing them with darts. And then the Jews returned rejoycing in their good fortune; and deriding the Romanes for being so deceived, lifting up their shields and bucklers, shouting and rejoycing.

The victory of the Jews.

B The Romanes souldiers were received of their Captains with threatnings, and of Cesar with this speech: The Jews led onely with desperation, doe all things with advice and counsell, devising deceits; and fortune favoureth their practices because they are ordered, and trusty to one another. And now the Romanes, whom for their obedience and discipline fortune was wont to favour, doe contrariwise offend herein, and for their rash and unadvised fighting are overcome: and which is worst of all, in Cesars presence offering to fight without their Captains. Truly the military law and discipline will be grieved hereat, and my father very sorrowfull to heare of this. For he who from his infancy unto old age, hath been trained up in arms, yet did he never offend in this sort; and what shall we say to our law that

C disobey their Emperours command? But (quoth he) they who so arrogantly have disobeyed our command, shall presently understand, that among the Romanes, victory against the Generals command is an infamy. Titus, having thus spoken in anger to the captains, evidently declared to them what and how he purposed to punish them. And they presently despaired, as though by and by they were justly condemned to die. But all the other legions flocking about Titus, besought him to pardon their fellow souldiers, and to remit the offence of the rashnesse of some few, for the obedience sake of the rest: affirming that their future valour should be a sufficient recompense for this their offence. Cesar was now pacified, partly thinking what was most profitable, partly for the intreaty of the rest: for he purposed to punish one man onely, and to rebuke the rest; and signifie to them his displeasure, and so he was reconciled to his souldiers, straightly charging them to be wiser hereafter: and after, he devised now to be revenged on the Jews for this deceit. When all the ground between the wals of Jerusalem and his army was in foure daies made plain, Titus being desirous safely to conduct the baggage and the rest of the multitude in safety, he placed the strongest of all his souldiers every one in his rank seven by seven, and caused them to march from the North part of the City unto the West, all along without the City wals, placing the footmen in the forefront, and in the last place the horsemen three in a rank, and between them both the Archers. So the Jews not able now to make any excursions, Titus souldiers being thus disposed of, the baggage of the three legions & the multitude passed along without any danger. And Titus himself being now within two furlongs of the City wals, pitched his rent against

CHAP. VII.

The description of Jerusalem.

F He Citie was compassed with a threefold wall on every side, save onely on that part where it was inclosed with valleys inaccessible: for on that side it had onely one wall. It was built upon two little hills, one of them being opposite unto another, and separated one from another with a valley, which was wonderfully replenished with houles. One of these hills whereon standeth the upper part of the City, is farre higher and steeper then the other, insomuch that because of the strength of it, King David in times past called it a Castle (this David was the father of King Solomon, who first builded the Temple in that place,) but we at this day call it the high market place. The other hill called Acra is the place where the lower part of the City stands. Opposite against this hill, there was also another lower then this Acra was, which was first divided from it with a large valley, but afterward at such time as the Asmoneans reigned, they did fill up this valley, to the intent intent they might joyn the City unto the Temple, and cut down the top of Acra, and so made it lower, that it might not hide the Temple. The valley, by which we have said the two higher hills are separated one from another, is called Tyropoeon, and reacheth unto Siloa (which is a fountain abounding with sweet water.) Without the City were two hills compassed with deep vallies: and being inclosed with high rocks, they were on every side inaccessible. The most ancient of the three wals, by reason of the valley about it, and the hill whereupon it stood, could not easily be taken: and beside the opportunitie of the place, it was very strongly built, at the cost and charges of David, Solomon, and other Kings. This wall, beginning at the tower called Hippicos, reacheth to that called Xystus, and afterward being joyned unto the Palace, it endeth in the West porch of the Temple: on the other side towards the West it begins at the same tower; and passing by the place that is called Betiso, it descends unto the gate of the Esseans, and so into the South, and from thence again it bendeth into the East, where also is Solomons pond, and reacheth unto the place called Ophian, where it is joyned unto the East porch of the Temple. The second wall beginneth at the gate that is called Genath, which is a gate of the former wall, and it onely compasseth the North part of the city, and reacheth to Antonia, a Castle so called. The third wall beginneth at the tower Hippicos, from whence it goeth into the North part, and from thence it cometh unto the tower Psephina, over against the Sepulchre of Helena that was Queen of Adiabena, and mother of King Izates: and passing along by the Kings caves, it turneth towards the tower neer the monument of Fullo, & in the valley called Cedron it joyneth with the old wall. Agrippa compassed that part of the City that he built, with this wall, it being before all open without defence. For the Citie grew so populous, that by little and little they were forced to inhabit some part without the wals: and this wall reacheth a great way, being joyned unto the hill next the Citie on the North side of the Temple. There was also a fourth hill inhabited, named Bezetha, situate against Antonia, but separated from it with very deepe ditches, which were made of purpose, lest that the foundation of Antonia being joyned unto it, it might be easier to come unto, and seeme lower: for the deepnesse of the ditch maketh the tower seeme much higher then otherwise it would. This place being added unto the city, is called in that countrey language Bezetha, which signifieth the new city. And the inhabitants desiring that part to be fortified, Agrippa, father to this Agrippa that finisheth the wall, did begin that wall aforementioned: and fearing lest Claudius Caesar, hearing how sumptuous a wall he built, should mistrust that he purposed to revolt, he onely laid the foundation of it, and so left it unfinished.

For the Citie could never have been taken by force, if he had finished that wall as he began it, it being built with stones twenty cubits long, and ten cubits broad, which could neither easily be undermined, nor battered with engines: and this wall was built ten cubits high, and no doubt had been raised higher, had not his liberality who began this building been hindered. Yet again by the Jews industry the same wall was raised twenty cubits high, the battlements hereof were two cubits high, and the tower three cubits, and in all it was twenty foure cubits high, as before. Upon the wall were three towers twenty cubits broad, and twenty cubits high, built foure-square very strongly, and was builded of as firme a foundation as the wall it selfe, which for the building and faire stone was not inferiour to the Temple above. Within this strong tower, which reacheth twenty cubits high, were roomes for men to dwell in, and cisterns to receive rain-water, and large turning stairs to go into every place there: and this third wall had fourscore and ten of these towers, and between every tower were two hundreth cubits space. The middle wall had fourteen towers, and the old wall had threescore, and the compasse of the whole City was three and thirty furlongs. And although the third wall was admirable, yet the tower of Psephina, which was built upon a corner of the wall, between the North and the West part of the City, had a certain excellencie of more wonder, against which part Titus had encamped himselfe: for it was seventy cubits high, so that from thence upon a cleere Sun-shine day, one might discover Arabia, and see the uttermost parts of all the dominions of the Hebrews unto the Sea, and it had eight corners. Just opposite to this was the tower Hippicos, and neer unto it were other two, that King Herod builded upon the old wall, which in bignesse, beauty and strength, did surpass all others in the whole world.

For King Herod, besides his naturall liberalitie and desire to adorn this City, did also for his own pleasure so beautifie this building, that it might excell all other, and dedicated them to three most renowned personages, whose names they also did bear, to wit, to his brother, his friend, and to his wife, the being (as is aforesaid) put to death for jealousy; the other two being slain in warres, after they had fought valiantly. The tower Hippicos called by the name

- A name of his friend, had foure corners, and every one of them were five and twenty cubits broad, and as many in length, and thirty cubits in height, being in no place hollow: and above the high places and stone-work, there was a well to receive rain-water, twenty cubits deep: and aloft of it were houses with double roofes twenty five cubits high, and divided into many roomes: and above them were battlements two cubits high, and turrets three cubits high: so that the whole height was accounted to be fourescore and five cubits. The second tower that by his brothers name he called Phaselus, was in breadth and length forty cubits, and so many cubits high, in figure of a square pillar, all which height was solid, and not hollow within: and above this a porch ten cubits high, decked with turrets and pinnacles. Over the midst of this porch he built another tower distinguished into goodly roomes and sumptuous baths, that it should not want any thing necessary for a Prince: on the top it was beautified with turrets and pinnacles, so that all his height was almost fourescore and ten cubits: And it resembled the tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continuall light is kept to guide the seamen that saile thither, saying that it had a greater compasse then it. And in this house now at this time did Simon lodge, who tyrannized over the people. The third tower was, according to the Queens name, called Mariamne, the wife of Herod, twenty cubits high, all solid, and other twenty cubits broad, having more magnificent and beautiful houses and lodgings then the rest. For the King so thought it meet, that the tower called by his wives name, should be more beautifull then they who onely bare the names of other men, like as they were stronger then this that bare the name of a woman. This tower was in all fifty five cubits high.
- Notwithstanding these three towers were of such height, yet by reason of their situation they seemed farre higher: for the old wall whereupon they were built was placed upon high ground, and the top of the hill whereupon they stood was above thirty cubits high, whereby their height was much increased. The greatnesse also was admirable: for it was not ordinary stone which men might beare, but all white marble, whereof every stone was twenty cubits long, and ten cubits broad, and five cubits thick: and they were so coupled one to another, that every stone by it self seemed a tower, and so cunningly conjoynd by workmens hands, that every tower seemed one stone. And these were placed on the North side of the Citie, and adjoyning to them within the City, was situate the Kings Palace, surpassing all that can be spoken of it: which for greatnesse and excellent work may be compared to all that were in the world. It was compassed about with a wall thirty cubits high, and adorned with goodly towers round about, every one of like distance from other, beautified with dwelling houses and lodgings for a hundred of the Nobilitie. The variety of the marble it was built withall, was admirable, all sorts being there used that were never so rare to be found: and the tops of these houses for the length of the beames and the beauty thereof passed all credit: and the multitude of roomes and diversity of buildings, all filled and adorned with household stuffe and furniture. And in every roome there were many vessels of gold and silver, and many porches round about, one answerable unto another, and pillars in every one. And there were many pleasant walks replenished with divers trees, and many walking places or alleys, all beset with conduits that spouted up water on high, and cisterns full of brazen images, from which ran out water: and about the water many dove-houses full of tame pigeons. But it is impossible sufficiently to declare the riches and beauty of the Kings Palace, and a grieve to think what goodly things, and how rich the theeves did there set on fire: for these things were not burnt by the Romanes, but by the seditious theeves (as is before said) at the beginning of this rebellion, who consumed all with fire, even from the Castle Antonia from whence the fire came, and destroyed the Kings Palace, and the covers and tops of of the three towers. The Temple was, as is before said, built upon a hard mountain, and at the first, the Plain upon the top thereof was scarcely big enough to contain it and the Temple yard, the hill being very steep. But when King Solomon, who also built the Temple, had compassed the East part thereof with a wall, he also placed a porch upon the rampire, and so for many ages after, it lay unfenced on other parts: wherefore the people every day bringing earth thither, at last made it plain and large enough: and breaking down the North wall they took in all that space which the Temple had continually occupied even untill now: and the hill being now inclosed with a threefold wall, it was a work passing all expectation in building. To the effecting whereof many ages were spent, and all the holy treasure offered to God, even from all parts of the world, was employed therein, as well in the buildings of the higher as of the lower part of the Temple: the foundations whereof were laid three hundred cubits deep, and in many places more: yet could not all the height of the foundations be seen, being now buried in vallies, that were filled up to make them equall with the straight streets of the city. The stones of this building were of fourty cubits: for the abundance of treasure and liberalitie of the people did effect that which was scarcely possible; and that which all men thought could never have come to passe, in time and by industry came to perfection.

The building was answerable unto these foundations. For all the porches were double, and every one was supported by pillars, each of them being five and twenty cubits high, and all of one piece and of white marble: the top whereof was all of Cedar, whose naturall beautie for the good conjoyning of this wood and polishing thereof, did astonish all that beheld it, being adorned neither with painting nor carved works. These porches were thirty cubits broad: and the compasse of them altogether, with the fort of Antonia, was six furlongs. All the ground whereon stood no building, was curiously wrought and paved with all sorts of stones. The way to the second Temple was all inclosed with stones of lattice work, which were three cubits high, and most beautifully wrought along: in which place also were placed certain pillars equally distant one from another, to shew the law of purification; some being written upon in Latine letters, other some in Greek, forbidding all strangers to enter into the holy place: for the second Temple is called the holy place. To go unto the second from the first, one must passe up fourteen stairs, and it was foursquare aloft, and enclosed with a wall by it self; whose outside being fourty cubits high, was all covered with stairs to ascend up unto it; and within, it was five and twenty cubits high: for all the part of the inner side was unseen, because it was built on the descent of a hill. After the fourteen stairs there was a Plain made levell with the wall of three hundreth cubits: from thence passed on five other stairs which lead unto the gates, whereof on the North side and the South there were eight, foure on each side, and two on the East. For it was necessary that there should be a peculiar place for women to exercise their devotion in, which also was inclosed with a wall. And so it was necessary there should be two doors: and against the first gate there was opposite unto it one gate on the North side, and another on the South, both separated from the rest, whereby one entred the place allotted for women; for it was not lawfull for any to passe by any other gate unto the women, neither could they go beyond their own door, because of the wall: for that place was common both to the women of that nation, & also to all strange women that came for religion sake. There was no gate on the West part, but a wall that reacheth all along in that place. Between the gates were porches opposite one against another, reaching from the wall unto the treasure house, supported with great and goodly pillars, being as plain and fully as big as they below. The gates were covered with gold and silver, as also the posts and foreparts thereof were, one onely excepted that was covered with Corinthian brasse, far surpassing in beauty the other that were covered with silver and gold. In every gate there were two doors, each one thirty cubits high, and fifteen cubits broad: and after the entrance where they were made larger, every one had on each side seats thirty cubits long, and large like a tower, and fourty cubits high, each one supported with two pillars twelve cubits thick. And all other gates were of like greatnesse; but that which was covered with Corinthian brasse, which was the entrance into the place allotted for the women, and opened into the East gate of the Temple, doubtlesse was bigger then the rest: for it was fifty cubits high (the gates whereof were fourty cubits) and was more richly adorned then the rest: for the cover of gold and silver was thicker then it was in the rest, which Alexander Tiberius his father had melted, to cover all the nine gates. And there were fifteene stairs, that went from the wall that separated the women, unto the great gate of the Temple: for these stairs were shorter by five degrees, then those that went to other gates. The Temple it self was situated in the midst of all, to wit, the holy Sanctuary, and had twelve stairs to go unto it. The forepart whereof was in height and breadth a hundreth cubits: and behinde, it was fourty cubits outright: and before, it was as it were two shoulders on each side rising up in height twenty cubits. The first gate hereof was seventy cubits high; and twenty five wide, and had no doore; for it signified that heaven was spread all over, and might be seen in every place: and all the foreparts were gilded with gold, and all the first building did appear and might be seen without, and all that was within and about the gate glistered with gold. The inner part thereof was divided into two rooms, whereof onely the first room might be seen, which was in height fourescore and ten cubits, and in length fourty, and in breadth twenty. The inner gate was (as is already said) all gilded with gold, and all the wall about it, and above it: it had a golden vine, whereon were hanging clusters of grapes all of gold, every cluster being as long as a man is high. And because the height was seeld above, the inner Temple did seeme to be lower then it was without, and it had golden gates fifty five cubits high, and sixteen cubits broad.

- A It had hangings also of the same length, which was a Babylonian vaile, all wrought with violet and purple silk and scarlet, admirable to behold: the permixtion of which colours had a mysticall meaning, bearing as it were the signification of the whole world. For the scarlet doth seeme to expresse the fire, the silk signifieth the earth, the violet sheweth the aire, and the purple declares the sea, partly in their colours resembling them, partly also, as having their beginning from them: for the purple is ingendred in the sea, and the silk is produced by the earth. In this tapestry work was curiously wrought, and desciphered all the speculations of the heavens, onely the Celestiall signes excepted. Being entred within, you come into a lower place of the Temple, which was 60. cubits high, and as many in length, and 20. in breadth. Again, this place was divided into two, whereof the first part contained 40. cubits, having in it three most admirable things, and famous thorow out the world, to wit, a candlestick, a table, and the altar of incense: upon the candlestick seven lamps were placed, which signifieth the seven Planets (for so many did there come all out of one stemme of the candlestick) upon the table were standing twelve loaves of bread, signifying the twelve celestiall Signes, and revolution of the year. By the altar of incense, out of which proceedeth thirteen odours, coming partly from the sea which is uninhabitable, and partly from the earth which is inhabited, is signified that all things are in the hands of God, and subject to yeeld him obedience. The inner part of the Temple contained 20. cubits, which also was separated from the other part by a vaile, and nothing was within it: and this place was the holy of holies, and no man might enter, look into it, nor violate the same. On each side of the lower Temple, there were many lodgings and doors to passe into, every one of them having three roofes one above another: and there was a gate which led unto both sides of the Temple, and unto these roomes: but the higher part of the Temple had not the like roomes on each side, and therefore it was made so much narrower then the other, yet was it higher then it by 40. cubits, neither was it so gorgious as the lower. For the whole height was 100. cubits, and the ground thereof 60. The uttermost part was so curious and richly wrought, that it was impossible for any one to imagine any workmanship that it wanted: for it was all covered with a massive plate of pure gold; which shined far brighter then the morning sunne, so that it dazled the eyes of the beholders, as doth the sunne when it is gazed upon. And a farre off it seemed unto strangers that came thither, like a white mountain: for where the Temple was not gilded with gold, there was it milk white. The top hereof was all set full of rods of gold, very sharpe at the upper end like pikes, lest the birds should come and sit thereon, and so defile it: many stones wherewithall it was built, were 45. cubits large, 5. cubits in length, and 6. cubits broad. Before the Temple there stood an Altar 15. cubits high, being 40. cubits broad, and as many long, and foure square, having corners made like hornes. The way to this Altar was on the South side, where it by little and little mounted from below even unto the Altar. This Altar was builded without yron, and never yron did touch it. The Temple and the Altar were inclosed with stone-work, beautifull to behold, which was a cubit high, separating the people from the Priests. Those that were troubled with a flux of their seed, and Lepers were expelled out of the citie; and women also having their monethly courses, and those that were not unclean, might passe this foresaid limit. Likewise men that were not purified, were not permitted to come within the inner Temple; and those that were, might not come among the Priests: those also that descended from the line of the Priests, and for blindness did not administer their function, were notwithstanding admitted into the place appointed for the rest of the Priests that were sound, and had a share as they had; yet did they go attyred as lay-men, for onely he that did sacrifice, might weare Priestly attire.

The Priests that come unto the Altar and Temple had no infirmity, and they were clothed in a fine linen garment, and abstained from wine, and lived in abstinence for reverence of religion, lest they should sinne whil' st they offered sacrifices. The high Priest also ascended with the Priests into the Temple; yet not alwaies, but every seventh day, and in the Calends of every moneth, or on a festivall celebrated according to the custome of their countrey, or wherein all the people were present. And then he sacrificed being girded with a vaile, which covered his thighes even unto his privities, under which he wore a linen garment hanging down unto his feet, and above it a round violet garment all fringed at the skirts, and hang'd full of golden bells, and pomegranats of gold, first one and then another: the bells signified thunder, and the pomegranats lightning. Upon his brest he wore a vesture of five colours; to wit, gold, purple, scarlet, silk and violet; which also (as we have said) the vails of the Temple were wrought withall. He had likewise a rotchet of the same, wherein was more gold, and in shape it was like the garment he wore on his body down to the thighes: it was also buttoned with two golden buttons, made in the form of Asps, wherein was inclosed the greatest and most precious Sardonyx stones that could be found, bearing the names of the 12. tribes of Israel engraven in them. On the other side did hang 12. precious stones, three and three in a rank, divided into foure rows. In the first was the Ruby, the Topaze and the Emerald: in the second the Carbuncle, the Jasper and the Saphire: in the third the Agate, the Amethyst and the Diamond: in the last the Onyx, the Beryl and Chrysolite, in every one of which one name of the twelve tribes was written. Upon his head he wore a miter of silk, which was crowned with Hyacinth: and aloft of it was another Crown of gold, wherein was ingraven sacred letters, to wit, the foure vowels. He did not alwaies use this garment, but another most commonly not so gorgeous: this he used when he entred into the Sanctuary, which he did onely once every yeer alone, none else going with him, upon which day all the nation was wont to fast. But we will hereafter speak more at large of the City and Temple, the laws and customes, the ordinances and observations: for these things cannot be briefly declared. The Castle Antonia was situate in a corner of the two porches of the first Temple, which looked unto the West and the North: and it was built upon a rock of stone of 50. cubits high, which on every side was inaccessible: this first was built by King Herod, to shew the greatnesse and magnificence of his minde. For first of all the rock at the foot thereof was all covered with thin and slender stones like slates, which did both adorn it, and would also easily slide down if any one walked upon them. Before the battlements of the fort there was a wall three cubits high, within which the Castle Antonia was built 40. cubits high, being within all furnished and contrived like the Palace of a King, having all kinde of houses of office, and other necessary roomes. For there were porches, bathes, and large hals, to place tents in: so that for all convenient roomes and places it seemed to be a City, and for the magnificence thereof a Kings Palace. In outward fashion it was built like a tower, and invironed about with foure other towers, at every corner one, whereof they that were on the South and East side were 70. cubits high, the other two were onely 50. So out of these two highest, one might have a perfect view of the whole Temple. Where it joynted to the porches of the Temple, there was on either side of it a paire of stairs for the souldiers to come down out of it into the Temple. For alwaies the Romane souldiers lodged there, and guarded the Temple in armour upon festivall daies, lest the people should attempt any rebellion or sedition. For the Temple was as a Castle to keep the town in awe, and the Castle Antonia to overthrow the Temple: there also were placed the souldiers: likewise in Herods Palace, which served for a Castle over the higher part of the city. The hill Bezetha was divided from the City, as is before mentioned: which being the highest of all, was joynted to part of the new city, which did obscure the view of the Temple on the North side. And thus I have here spoken sufficiently of the city and the wall in this place, because we mean hereafter to describe them more at large.

CHAP. VII.

25000. follow
Simon.

Simons campe against John.

THe most warlike of all the people joynted with Simon, being in number ten thousand, beside the Idumeans: and those ten thousand had 50. Captains of their own fellows, yet all subject unto Simon. The Idumeans that took his part were five thousand and had ten Captains, the chief of whom were Jacob the sonne of Sesar, and Simon, the sonne of Cathla. And John, who kept the Temple, had six thousand armed men, over whom were twenty Captains: and then there came unto him two thousand of the Zealous, and foure hundred, who before had followed Eleazar and Simon, the son of Iairus. So these warring one against another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that were not seditious as they were, was their prey. Simon kept the higher part of the City, and the greater wall even unto Cedron, and all that part of the old wall which is between Siloa and the Palace of Monobazus, who was King of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the river Euphrates: he also kept all the hill Acra (which is the lower part of the city) unto Helenas Palace, who was Monobazus his mother. But John kept all the Temple and the space about it, Ophila, & the valley Cedron: and that which was between these two places which Simon and John kept, was all consumed with fire, & made a place to fight in. For although the Romanes tents were pitched neer unto the wals of the City, yet did not this sedition cease; but having recovered some securitie a while at the Romanes first coming, presently they returned unto their former wont. And dividing themselves again, every man fought for his own part,

A part, doing all that the Romanes could wish to be done. For the Romanes did them no more harme then they did themselves: for after them the city suffered no new calamity, but indured farre more misery before it was taken and destroyed by the Romanes, then it did at that time. For the Romanes in destroying it, did rather end their misery then bring them into it. For the seditious did take the city, and the Romanes did overcome and take the seditious, which was farre stronger then the wals: so that one may ascribe all their miseries to their own nation, and equitie and justice unto the Romanes, as every one shall cleereely see by that which ensued.

The City being in the estate before said, Titus with chosen horsemen went up and down without it, to espy where he might most easily assault the wals. And being in doubt a long time what to do, for that where the valley was, footmen could not possibly get up to it; and where it was walled, they seemed to be impossible to be battered down with engines: at last he determined to assault it on that part, where was the monument of Iohn the high Priest: for onely in this place the first wall was lower then in other places, and it was not compassed here with the second wall, for this place was not fortified, because that those parts of the new city were not much inhabited. So that from this place the wall might easily be assaulted: whereby Titus was perswaded that the higher city, and the Temple, and Antonia, might easily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends called Nicanor, came unto him: who was shot in the left shoulder with an arrow, because he desired to come neer Ioseph, who went thither of purpose to perswade the Jews: which were upon the wall to yeeld: for Nicanor was very eloquent. Cesar perceiving their mindes, and that they would not abstain from him, who perswaded them to that which was most expedient for them, was now moved, & began earnestly to besiege them: and so he permitted his souldiers to waste al the suburbs, & to gather all the rubbish, stones, wood, and other matter together, and made therewith a mount. And dividing his army into three parts, he disposed of every one what he should do, and in the midst of all upon the mounts he placed archers, and before them engines for shot, wherewithall he hindred the incursions of his enemies, lest they should annoy the work, and also did beate those off from the wall, who made any resistance from thence. And presently all trees being cut down, the suburbs appeared naked. Whilest the Romanes having gathered the wood together, were busied in the work, the Jews were not idle: and then the people, who were troubled with murders and robberies, did hope to have an end of their misery, the seditious people being busied against their enemies: and they now hoped that if the Romanes did overcome, they might be revenged upon them. Iohn still kept where he was, fearing Simon, yet were his followers very earnest to assault the Romans. But Simon being next unto the siege, did not rest, but placed all along that part of the wall, men with darts, which before were taken from Sessen Governor of the Romanes, and found in the Castle of Antonia. But the darts did the Jews small pleasure, by reason that few of them knew how to use them: onely some who were taught by certain that fled from the Romanes, could use them a little. Yet did they assault the Romane souldiers that were building the mounts, with arrows and stones, and also made incursions upon them by companies, and fought with them. But the Romane workmen were defended by hurdles that were of purpose set before them: and every legion had strange and admirable engines against the excursions of their enemy, and especially the engines that the tenth legion had to cast darts, and others that cast stones, which did not onely repulse them, by whom they were assaulted, but also those that stood upon the wall: for every stone was a talent weight, and were shot more then a furlong, and slew not onely those that they did first strike, but also many that were stricken with the rebound. But the Jews alwaies espied the stones before they came (for they were white) and so avoided them: and they were not onely descried by the noise they made in flying, but they might easily be perceived: and by this means the watchmen in the towers gave warning alwaies when these engines were shot off, and when the stones came, crying in their countrey language, The stone comes: so the Jews upon the wals knowing what they meant, avoided the stones, and so received no harme. Then the Romanes deviled to black the stones with inke, and so they could not be seen as they flew, but at one stroke slew many. But the Jews were not herewith so terrified, that they permitted the Romanes peaceably to build the mount, but night and day they hindred them with stratagems and valour. Now when the Romanes had finished their work, the Carpenters measured the space between the mounts and the wals with a plummet fastned unto a line, which they cast from one place unto another: for they could not measure it otherwise, because of the darts cast from the wals, and finding that they had rammes long enough, they set them up, and Titus commanded the wall to be battered in three places, to the end that the battery might not be hindred. The noise that these rams did make, was heard round about the city; and the citizens cried mainely out, and the seditious persons were also sore afraid. And seeing themselves all in like danger, they now determined to joyn all together in resisting the Romanes: and the seditious cried one unto another, saying, that they rather assisted the enemies, then resisted them: and therefore exhorted one another at least for that time to become friends, if not for ever, onely to resist the Romanes. And Simon sent a cryer unto the Temple, licensing all such as would, to come unto the wals: which also John did permit, notwithstanding he mistrusted Simon: so they forgetting their old quarrell, joyned all together, and resisted the Romanes, and guarding the wals round, they cast much fire upon the engines of the Romanes, and against those that did rule them; and threw darts against them without intermission: and the boldest amongst them in great companies leapt down, & destroyed that where with the engines were covered; and assaulted those that stood to defend them; and so did the Romanes much harme, by reason of their desperate boldnesse, more then by their skill.

Titus was still at hand to succour them that stood in need: and placing horsemen and Archers about the engines, he repulsed the Jews who came to cast fire, and repressed them that cast darts, and shot arrows from the towers, and so gave the rams time and opportunity to beat the wals. Yet for all this the wall was not shaken with rams, save onely that the ram of the fifth legion did shake the corner of a tower; but yet the wall stood firme, and was not harmed by the shaking of the tower: for it was far higher then the wall, and so could not draw down any part of the wall as it fell. So soon as they had a while ceased from excursions, they perceived that all the Romanes were busied in one labour or other, and so dispersed all over the camp, thinking that the Jews for fear durst come no more. The Jews all secretly issued out of the gate by the tower Hippicos, and cast fire upon the works, and courageously made incursion upon the Romanes even unto the rampier of their camp. The Romanes seeing what danger might ensue, presently assembled themselves, both they that were neer, and those that were far off. The discipline of the Romanes overcame the fury of the Jews: and putting those to flight that first met them, they assaulted those that opposed themselves against them afterward. So there began a grievous battell about the engines; the Jews striving to fire them, and the Romanes fighting to hinder them: and a doubtfull cry was raised on both parts, and many in the forefront were slain on both sides. But the Jews audacity got them the upper hand; and their fire did something touch the engines: and all had been consumed quite with fire, had not the chosen souldiers that came from Alexandria hindred it, who for the opinion that they had of themselves did fight stoutly (for they were accounted to have been the most valiant of all in this battell) till such time as the Emperour with certain selected horsemen, came and set violently upon the enemies: and he himself slew 12 men that did resist him, for whose deaths the rest fearing fled, and were forced to retire themselves into the city, and so saved the engines from being fired. It chanced that one of the Jews was in this fight taken alive, and Titus commanded that he should be crucified before the wall, that perhaps the rest being herewithall terrified might yeeld. After Cesar was retired, John the Captain of the Idumæans talking upon the wall with one of his friends, being stricken in the breast with an arrow by an Arabian souldier, presently died: which caused great lamentation amongst the Jews, and sorrow amongst the seditious, for he was valiant of his hands, and very wise and of good advice.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the fall of the tower: and how the two wals were taken.

THe night following, there was a great tumult amongst the Romanes. For Titus the Emperour had commanded to be builded three towers, 90. cubits high a piece, each one upon a severall mount, that from thence he might the more easily beate the enemies from off the wals: but one of these towers in the midst of the night fell down without any assault. And making a great noise with the fall, fear fell upon the whole army; who suspecting that it came to passe by some stratageme wrought by the Jews, every one ran and armed himselfe, and so there was a great tumult in the army: and for that no man could tell what the matter was, a long time, they stood as it were all amazed, every one asking his fellow what had hapned. And seeing no enemies come, they began to feare some treason amongst themselves; and so were in a great feare they knew not wherefore, till such time as Titus understanding the matter, caused the truth thereof to be presently proclaimed thorowout the camp; and so the tumult (although with much adoe) was appeased.

The

A The Jews valiantly bearing and induring all other dangers, were sore troubled by reason of these towers which Titus had erected; for they were slain and wounded from thence with small engine shot, darts and arrows; neither could they build themselves any so high, nor was there any hope to destroy them: for neither could they be thrown down for their weight, nor fired, because they were covered with yron: and so they flying out of the reach of the shot, did not seek to hinder the ram from battering their wals; which never ceasing, at last prevailed somewhat. So the great ram, which the Jews called Nicon, because it overcame all, at last battered the wall; and the Jews being weary with fighting, for that they had watched all the night before, for sloth, or else because they perswaded themselves that the wall was superfluous, they having two more beside it, they all forsook their quarters, and retired themselves unto the second wall; and the Romanes entred the first, that the ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romanes that had passed and entred the first wall, went and opened the gates and let in the whole army. Having thus gotten the wall the seventh day of May, they destroyed the greatest part thereof; and also the North side of the city which before Cestius had wasted.

Titus removed his campe from thence, and went unto the place called the Assyrians campe, and seized upon all between that and Cedron; and being without the shot of an arrow from the second wall, he began again to assault it. Then the Jews dividing the wall betwixt them to defend each others part, they resisted most valiantly. And John and his partakers defended all Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders tombe: and Simon defended all from Johns tombe unto the gate by the tower Hippicos. And many times issuing out at the gates they fought hand to hand with the enemy, being alwaies repulsed by the discipline of the Romanes, onely for want of knowledge in warlike affairs; and still in all fights upon the wall they got the best: for the Romanes were assisted by fortune and knowledge, and the Jews with desperate boldnesse which came of fear; for they are of stout courage in adversitie. Moreover, the Jews were moved to fight, in hope that way to save their own lives: and the Romanes to get a speedy conquest. Neither party was weary, neither did they ever cease from assaulting one another: all the day long the Jews in whole companies made excursions against the Romanes, and they omitted no kinde of fight, beginning at Sun-rise, and continuing all night long, farre more terrible to them both then in all the day before: the Jews feared lest that the Romanes should get the wall; and the Romanes likewise misdreaded that the Jews should invade their campe. Thus still all night long being armed, early in the morning they were prepared again to fight. The Jews did one strive with another who should undergo the most danger, and so deserve his Captains favour. Simons followers did greatly reverence and fear him, insomuch as if he should have commanded any of them to have killed himself, he would presently have done it. The Romanes were encouraged to fight, by their wont and custome in getting the victory, and that they were not wont to be overcome: again, their frequent and daily warres and continuall exercises, and large dominions gave the like courage, and especially Titus their Generall still present in all their affairs greatly stirred them forward: for every one thought it a hainous crime to be a coward in the presence of such a Captain as Caesar was. Caesar himselfe beholding and

C looking on, who also was a witnesse of their deeds that behaved themselves valiantly, would reward every man for his valour: beside that, it was advantage to be easily known unto the Prince for a valiant man: so that many of them shewed that their alacritie was farre greater then their strength. At this time Longinus one of the horsemen coming out of the Romanes army, pressed into the midst of the Jews forces, and casting them down that stood in his way, by this violence he slew two of the strongest of the enemies amongst them, striking one of them over the face, and slaying the other with his own dart he took from him: who for this deed was greatly honoured, having broken thorow a strong army of the Jews, that were placed before the wals, and cast darts at him on either side. Many of the Romanes by this his example were inticed to do the like: The Jews now regarded not what they suffered, but onely devised which way to harme their enemy; nothing esteeming death, so that they might kill some one of the Romanes. But Titus had as much care to preserve his souldiers, as he had to get the victory; affirming these rash assaults to proceed of desperation: and that onely was to be accounted for vertue, when one did warily not indanger himself to archieve any worthy action, and willed them rather to shew themselves men where there was no danger.

Castor a subtil
Jew.

When Titus commanded the ram to be set up against the tower on the North part of the Citie, wherein a craftie and politike Jew accompanied with ten men had hid himself, all the rest being fled: this Jew was named Castor. These men having lien still a while there in their armour, at last being afraid, and the Tower beginning to shake, they start up: and Castor stretching forth his hand, did as it were humbly crave favour at Casars hands, and with a lamentable voice besought him to spare him. Titus seeing the mans simplicitie, as he thought, and perswading himself that the Jews did now repent them of their enterprize, he caused the ram to cease from battery, and the archers to hold their hands; and withall permitted Castor to speak his pleasure. Castor said, that he desired to come and make a league of peace. And Titus answered, that he would grant it, if so be all the rest would do so likewise; and that he would presently confirme a league of peace between him and the city. Five of Castors fellows seemed to be willing, and to request the like; but the other five counterfainted to withstand them, crying out aloud, that they would never be slaves to the Romanes, seeing they might die in libertie. Whilest Castor and his fellows were debating the matter, the battery ceased. In the mean time Castor privily sent word unto Simon, willing him whilest the battery ceased, to deliberate what was expedient to be done in this necessitie: for he a while would deceive the Roman Emperour, and hold him in suspence. And in the meantime he seemed to exhort his companions that denied to embrace the kinde offer of Titus: and they as it were angry hereat, drew their swords and stroke upon their corslets; and they so stricken seemed to fall down, as though they had been slain. Titus and his souldiers were amazed at this their obstinacy; for being on the lower ground, they could not well perceive what was done: and so they wondred at their desperation, and also pitied their calamity. At this time one strook Castor in the buttock with a dart, and Castor pulling it out of his flesh, shewed it unto the Emperour, and complained of it, as being injured. Titus presently with sharpe words corrected him that shot it, and forthwith would have sent Ioseph to promise Castor pardon and peace. But Ioseph denied to go, affirming that Castor onely dissembled, and so hindred his friends that would have gone. At last one Aeneas, who had fled unto the Romanes, offered himself to go. Castor invited him, as though he would give him something in token of his true meaning. Then Aeneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Castor would have cast him down something of worth: and when he came underneath the tower, Castor took a great stone and threw it down upon him, yet hurt him not, because he was aware of it, and avoided the stone; but it wounded another souldier standing by. Then Casar considering this deceit, began to think that piety & mercy in wars was hurtfull, and that cruelty was not so easily deceived, and so being very angry at this deceit, he caused the wall to be beaten with the ram more then before. Castor and his fellows perceiving the tower to shake, they set it on fire, and so passed thorow the flame, and conveyed themselves into a mine of the tower, so that again the Romanes admired their courage, thinking that they had burned themselves.

Mercy in wars
hurtfull.

Titus taketh
wall.

Titus assaulting the wall on his part, took it five daies after that he had taken the first; and causing the Jews to fly from thence, he accompanied with a thousand chosen men about him, entred in where the woolmen, and coppersmiths, and marchant-tailors dwelt, which place was the new city, having onely narrow and streight waies to go unto the wall. And had he presently beaten down a great part of the wall, or according to the laws of arms destroyed what he had gotten, he had obtained the victory without any losse on his side. Yet now hoping the Jews would yeeld, seeing that if he pleased he might take them by force, he gave the more ample and easie passage to retire: for he did not think that they whose good he fought, would have been traitors unto him.

CHAP. X.

When Titus was entred the city, he suffered none of them that were taken, to be slain, nor the houses to be burned, but permitted the seditious (if they were so minded) to fight, and that without the prejudice of the people: and also promised the people to restore unto them all their goods. For many besought him to spare the City for them, and the Temple

A Temple for the citie. The people were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Jews thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and judged that Titus, for that he despaired to winne the rest of the city, did now coward-like propound these conditions. They likewise threatned all the people, that whosoever should speak one word concerning peace and yeelding unto the Romanes, should presently die: and some of them did resist the Romanes from out of their houses, & others in the narrow waies: and others going out at the higher gates, began a battell; wherewith the watch men being sore troubled, fled from wall, and forsaking the towers, they retired themselves into their camp. The Roman souldiers within the city cryed out, because they were inclosed with enemies, the gates being shut, and assaulted without, by those who apprehended their companions to be in great danger. The number of the Jews encreasing, and prevailing, for that they knew the waies and turnings of the streets, many of the Romanes were slain, and violently born down, when they offered to resist in that necessitie: for a multitude together could not flye, by reason of the narrownesse of the streets, that went unto the wall: and all that entred into the city had been slain, had not Titus succoured them. For placing at the beginning of every street archers, and himselfe being where most need was, he so did drive away the Jews with darts and arrows: and with him Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight was proved a stout warrior; who so long continued beating the Jews with arrows, till all the souldiers were escaped away.

They interpret warlike Titus humanity for cowardize. The Romanes are driven out by the Jews.

Thus the Romanes having got the second wall, were beaten from it again: And the citizens fit for war, were hereat encouraged, and were drunken with this good fortune, thinking that now the Romanes durst no more offer to come into the citie, and that they could not be overcome, if they did arme themselves to fight. For God, because of their iniquity had darkened their understanding, so that they never considered that the Roman forces were far greater then they that were overcome, nor the famine that presently ensued: for as yet they lived upon the destruction of the people, and drank the blood of a citie: but the good did even now suffer famine, and many of them had already perished for want of food: yet the seditious did rejoyce at the death of the Citizens, as though thereby they were eased of a great burthen, onely desiring their lives that bare rebellious mindes, and would joyne with them against the Romanes, rejoycing at the death of the rest, as free from a heavy clogge: and this was the affection they bare unto their Citizens. And so they armed themselves and resisted the Romanes, who now again did attempt to enter the breach: and they threw down stones and part of the wall upon them as they came up, and so drave them back again, and valiantly resisted them for three dayes. But the fourth day they were not able to withstand Titus his assault, but were forced to retire, as before: and he having gotten the wall, destroyed all the North part thereof, and placed a garrison in the towers and fortresses of the South part.

The Jews courage encreaseth.

The people in want, and many die for hunger.

CHAP. XI.

Of the mounts raised to batter the third wall: and a long Oration of JOSEPHUS to persuade the people to yeeld: and of the famine in the Citie.

E TITUS now determined to batter the third wall, and he thought to continue the siege but a short time: and that it was convenient to give the seditious some time to bethink themselves, to see if that either by the taking of the second wall, or terrified with famine, they would repent. For now there were no more preys for them left in the city, and he lay before the wals thereof, even as he desired. And the time being come, that every souldier should receive victuals and provision for himselfe, Titus caused them to be led every one in order into a place, where the Jews in the city might presently behold them, and caused his captains to distribute money to every one: and the souldiers (as their custome is) all armed, and drawing their swords out of their sheathes, marched along, the horsemen leading their horses gallantly adorned, and a great part of the suburbs glistened with gold and silver. This spectacle was gratefull to their own souldiers, and terrible to the Jews: for all the old wals, and the North part of the city, and many houses were filled with the multitude of them, who came to view this sight: and there was no part of the city that was not filled with people to see and behold it. And fear came upon the very boldest amongst all the Jews, seeing both the Romanes armour and their order: and perhaps that shew would have caused the seditious people to have relented, had they not despaired to have found mercy and pardon at the Romanes hands for their offences.

committed; and so they thought it better presently to be slain in warres, then to be put to death shamefully, if they desisted from fight. Destinie also hindred this, whereby it was decreed that the innocent should perish with the wicked, and the city with the seditious, and for foure daies space they distributing necessaries unto the souldiers; and on the fifth day Titus perceiving that for ought he could do, the Jews were still obstinate, he divided his army into two parts, and about Iohns tombe he began to raise mounts, and against Antonia, hoping that waies to take the higher part of the city, and by Antonia to seize the Temple; which except he could effect, he could not safely take the Citie: and against either of these places he raised two mounts, every legion making one. The Jews and Simons followers did hinder the work that was begun before Iohns tombe, and Iohn likewise with a great number of the Zealous hindred them that made the mounts over against Antonia: who not onely did fight with the advantage of the higher ground, but also had now learned the use of engines: for continuall use by little and little made them skilfull, and they had 300. engines called Balistaes: and 40. engines to cast stones, wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romanes, and hindred them from their work.

Titus, foreknowing that fortune would favour him, and that the city was like to perish, hastened to take it, never ceasing to perswade the Jews to yeeld: and with his deeds he joynd counsell. For he knew that many times words prevaile more then violence of arms, and exhorted them to save themselves, and yeeld the city unto him: and told them of Ioseph, how that he should make a speech unto them in their own language, for he hoped that they would heare their own countreyman. Then Ioseph, going about the city without the danger of shot, cried unto them to spare themselves, the city, the Temple, the people, and not become more hard-hearted unto them then strangers were. For the Romanes did reverence the holy places, notwithstanding they had no society or portion in them; and how even till this day they had abstained from violating them: and they who were nourisht with them, and might onely save them, did wilfully cause their destruction: and bad them consider that their strongest wals were battered down, and onely now the weaker remaining unbattered, he willed them to consider, how they were not able to withstand the Romanes forces. And that it was no news to the Jews, nor strange, to be subject unto the Romanes. For although it be a good and commendable thing, to fight for liberty, yet that was to be done in the beginning: for he that was once subject, and would rebell, having a long time lived under the obedience of the Romanes, seemed rather to be desirous of a shamefull death then a lover of libertie. Moreover, that they should disdain to be subject unto base people, and not unto them whom the whole world obeyed. For (said he) what place have not the Romanes that may be inhabited? Nay themselves might perceive how fortune did still favour them: and that God who guided the Empire to be placed in all parts, was now in Italy. Also that even by the law of nature, as well by the example of beasts as men, we are taught to give place unto them that are stronger then our selves, and be contented that they should get the victory that are valiantest in arms. And this (quoth he) was the cause that your ancestors, who were farre more strong and politik then you, and had better means to resist, yet did they submit themselves unto the Romanes: which if God had not been pleased withall, he would never have permitted them to have done. And how could they hope to resist, seeing the city was as it were already taken? And that the citizens supposing their wals were whole, yet were they all destroyed. For the Romanes well knew what famine was amongst them, and how it did every day waste the people, and would also in short time destroy the warriours amongst them. For suppose that the Romanes would cease, and not besiege the citie, nor offer with drawn swords to assault it: yet is there a civill warre within the citie, which the Jews cannot overcome or avert, it every day increasing: except they would also fight against hunger, and and they alone overcome adverse fortune. Further, he added, that it was best, before intolerable calamities befell them, to change their opinion, and whilest they have time, to be counselled by good advice; and that the Romanes would not punish them for that which was already past, except they persisted obstinate even unto the end. For they are (quoth he) kind, courteous, and gentle to their subjects, and doe preferre their commodity before revenge. And they thought it advantage to have the Citie, and the countrey inhabited; therefore the Emperour would make a league of peace with them: but if he took the Citie by force, he would not spare one, especially seeing that they were willed by him to save themselves, and yet in their greatest necessitie refused to obey him. Likewise he told them that the third wall would also be taken very shortly, as well they might perceive by the two wals: and suppose that the city was inexpugnable, yet the famine would cause it to be yeelded into the Romanes hands in despite of them.

- A As Ioseph did thus advise them, many standing upon the wals did raile against him, many upbraided him, and others shot at him. Ioseph seeing he could not avert them from their imminent calamities, recounted unto them all their own Histories making for his purpose. O wretches (quoth he) and ungratefull to them that help you! you fight against the Romanes, and beare armes against them, as though this way you had conquered some others that came, as they now do, against you. When doth God the maker of all things deny help unto us if we be oppressed? Will you not remember yourselves? For what cause did you enterprize these warres, and how great a friend and assister of yours do you daily offend? Do ye not remember the miraculous works of your ancestors, and this holy place, and how in times past it was by the enemies destroyed? but I quake and tremble to recount the works of God to such unworthy hearers: yet harken, that you may know that you do not onely resist the Romanes, but also God himself. Nechias at that time King of Egypt, who also was called Pharus, came, and with an infinite army took away Queen Sara, the mother of our nation. And what did our first father Abraham in this case? Did he with weapons and armes revenge this injury? having under his command three hundredth and eighteen Captains, and under them an infinite multitude? Or did he rather desist from warre, perceiving God not to accompany him? wherefore lifting up pure and undefiled hands towards this holy place, which now you have defiled and profaned, he chose God an invincible helper to aid him. And was not the Queen the second night after sent home againe unto him untouched? And the Egyptian adoring this holy place, which ye have polluted with murders of your own nation, and trembling at the visions he saw in the night time, fled, rewarding the Hebrews with gold and silver, whom he perceived to be so beloved of God. Shall I recount unto you the going of our ancestors into Egypt? who having for four hundredth yeers been slaves unto the Egyptian Tyrants and Kings, and able to have revenged themselves by force of arms, yet did they rather expect and stay Gods leisure. Who knoweth not, that then Egypt in revenge of the Hebrews, was filled with all kindes of serpents, and infected with all diseases, and the earth became so barren, that Nilus waxed dry, and the ten plagues followed one another without ceasing; whereby our ancestors were safely delivered without any blood-shed: for God conducted them, as willing to reserve them for his Priests?
- D When the Assyrians had taken away from us the holy Ark, did not Palestina and Dagon repent that fact? did not all the nation of them that took it, weep and lament therefore? For their privie parts being putrified, their bowels and the meat they did eat ranne out there; and so with unclean hands they were forced to bring it back again, with cymbals and trumpets: thereby to make satisfaction for their offence. It was God that did this for our ancestors, because that they laying their arms aside, wholly resigned themselves to his pleasure. Was Senacherib King of Assyria, coming with all his power out of Asia, and incamping himself before this City, overcome by humane force? Did not our ancestors leaving arms, flie to prayers, and by an Angel God in one night destroyed an infinite army? And the next day the Assyrian rising, found a hundred fourscore and five thousand of his men dead, and so fled with the rest from the Hebrews being unarmed, and not pursuing him? You know also, that
- E in the captivitie of Babylon, where the people lived the space of seventy yeers, they got not their liberty, till such time as God put in Cyrus heart to suffer them to go into their own country. Who still assisting them, they again as the Priests in old time were wont, did serve and reverence their helper. In brief, our ancestors did never atchieve any great matter by force of arms, neither did they leave any thing undone, wherein they expected Gods help, but still remaining quiet at home, they overcame their enemies through his providence: and when they did fight after their own wils, they alwaies failed of their expectation. For when Zedechias our King, contrary to the admonition of the Prophet Jeremy, did go forth, and fight with the King of Babylon then besieging the citie, both he and all his were taken, and this city destroyed. Yet consider how far your captains are inferiour unto that King, and your
- F selves unto the people of those times. For Jeremy crying up and down the city, and saying that God was offended at their iniquity, and that except they did yeeld the same, it should be taken by force, yet did not the King nor any of the people lay hands upon him. And you (that I may omit your iniquity, done within the city, which though I would I could not sufficiently discipher) do attempt to kill me, and using railing speeches against me, who once gave you wholesome counsell for your good, onely for that I put you in minde of your sins, you not enduring to heare of that which you daily commit. This same becomed also when Antiochus surnamed Epiphaneus besieged the city, God being highly displeased at our ancestors, who going out in armes against him were all slaine, the towne spoiled, and this holy place for three yeers and six moneths made desolate. What should I shew unto you any more examples?

examples? Who first incited the Romanes themselves against the Jews? Was it not the impietie of our own countrey men that did it? Whence began our bondage at that time? Did it not proceed from the sedition of our ancestors, when the furie of Aristobulus and Hircanus brought Pompey into our citie: and so God subdued them unto the Romanes, being now unworthy of liberty? And at length for three moneths space having endured a siege, being not so great offenders as you are, and better able to abide the siege then you, yet did they yeeld themselves. Are we ignorant of the end of Antigonus, the sonne of Aristobulus, who invading the Kingdome, brought our nation againe into subjection, God so laying this bondage upon them, for that he was moved at the iniquitie of our nation? and Herod the sonne of Antipater, brought Sosius and the Roman army, and besieged the city round six moneths space: and at last, for the greatnesse of our iniquitie was taken and punished for their offences, and the citie sacked by the enemies. So you evidently see that our nation did never prevaile by force of armes. And assure your selves that the Citie will be taken by this siege. It is meet therefore that you who keep this holy place, wholly commit your selves to Gods will and pleasure, and then feare not the forces of the enemies, when by reason of your piety, you are assured of Gods help and succour. But what one parcell of Gods Law have you observed? Nay, what mischief have you left undone, that he detested not? How farre greater is your impietie then theirs, that did suddenly perish for their finnes? For you making small account of secret sins, to wit, stealing, deceit, and adulteries; do violently take away mens goods by open force, and murder whom ye please, and have devised new wayes to sinne. Moreover, you have made the holy Temple a place of all these your impieties; and the seat that the Romanes did adore, is by your own nation polluted: much derogating from the honour of our religion by your impious facts. Last of all, you hope of his help whom you have so hainously offended.
Truly you are very just people and obedient, and with pure hands you ask help of God. Did our King thus pray unto God, when he obtained that in one night so many of the Assyrians should be destroyed? Or do the Romanes commit such impiety as the Assyrians did, that you may hope of the like revenge against them? for he having received a piece of money to save the city, did, not regarding his oath, seek to destroy the same. The Romanes do onely request the tribute that our ancestors were wont to pay unto them: which if they have, they will never destroy the Citie, nor touch our holy things. They will also permit you to enjoy freely your families and possessions, and suffer our laws to remain inviolate. It is altogether madnesse for you to hope that God will so punish just men, as he did sinners and impious persons, who knoweth to punish at his pleasure. To be short, he destroyed the Assyrians the first night, that they encamped before the Citie. And if he purposed also to deliver you, and punish the Romanes, he would then have done it, when Pompey and Sosius came against the Citie, or when Vespasian wasted Galilee, or lastly now, when Titus came to assault it. But neither Pompey nor Sosius suffered any harm, yet both of them took the Citie. Vespasian so gained by warring against us, that he hath hereby got the whole Empire. And the fountains which before gave you no water, yeeld it to Titus in great abundance. You know that before his coming, the fountains without the citie and Siloa were so dried up, that water was sold by measure: yet now they flow so plentifully, that they do not onely serve all their army, and their cattell also, but besides that, do water all the gardens about. What this wonder foretellet, you have already experience, when the King of Babylon came with his army and destroyed the Citie: who took it and fired it and the Temple, notwithstanding that (as I am perswaded) the Jews of that time were nothing so wicked as you are. Wherefore I think that God hath forsaken this holy place, and is now gone to them that do besiege you. Will not a good man flie a wicked house, and hate the impious that dwell therein? And do you then think that God will abide your impietie, who beholdeth all secrets, and knoweth all things that are hid? But what is secret amongst you? Or what do you seek to hide? Nay, what do you that your enemies do not know? All your iniquities are disclosed to all men: and you every day strive one with another who shall be most impious. And you do as greatly labour to shew your selves vicious, as others do to shew themselves vertuous. Yet for all this, there is time to amend, and Gods wrath will be appeased, if ye acknowledge your finnes, and be penitent for your offences. Cease from arms, be ashamed of your countrey now ruined through your own means. Turn your eyes and behold the beauty of the place, whose ruin you seek. How brave a City, how gorgeous a Temple, how rich with the gifts of all nations?
Who would fire these? Who would desire the ruin of these? Or what is there in the world that better deserveth to be preserved then these? O hard-hearted people, and more blockish then stones! If you do not pitie these, yet let your families move you; every one of you look upon your children, wives and parents, who shall all presently be consumed, either with

A with sword or famine. I know that together with you shall perish my family, and wife, and house, which sometime were of no small account: And perhaps some of you do think me therefore to speak this unto you, but kill them, and take my blood for recompence of your welfare and lives: I my self am also prepared to die, if after my death you would remember your selves.

The year of the world, 4014, after Christs nativity, 73.

Joseph crying thus unto them with teares trickling down his cheekes, the seditious were nothing moved, but told him that it was not safety for them to yeeld. But the people were perswaded to flye: and some selling their possessions and that they had for small prices, they did swallow down the gold, for fear the theeves should take it from them. And so when they had escaped unto the Romanes, they emptying their bellies found it againe, and so had money to buy them necessities. Titus also permitted many to go away whithersoever they pleased: which thing caused divers to flye, seeing that thereby they were delivered out of their calamitie, which in the Citie they abode, and were not forced to serve the Romanes.

Josephs love and constancie towards his country.

The people flye with their money.

B But John and Simon were as diligent to stop the wayes, lest the Citizens should escape, as they did hinder the Romanes from entring into the Citie: so that whosoever did but give any suspicion of flight, he was presently by them put to death. The richer sort, whether they stayed or fled, were slain for their wealth and possessions. The famine of the citie, and the desperation of the theeves both increased a like, every day more and more; so that now there was no more corne found. Wherefore the seditious persons brake into the houses, and searched every corner for to finde corne, and if after their search they found any, then they did beat the owners for denying it at the first: and if they found none, they tortured the householders, as having more cunningly hidden it. And whosoever was yet strong of body, and well liking, him they presently kild, for hereby they deemed him to have store of food, or else he should not have bin in so good plight of body as he was. And they that were pined with famine, were by these barbarous seditious people slaine, who esteemed it no offence to kill them, who would shortly after die though they were left alive. Many both rich and poore secretly exchanged all that they had for one bushell of corne, and presently shutting themselves in the secretest roome of their house, some of them did eate the corne as it was, unground: others made bread thereof as necessitie and feare required. No man in the whole citie sate down to eate his meat on a table, but greedily taking it not boyled from the fire, they even raw as it

The argument of store of meat.

C was did eat it. Most miserable was this manner of living, and a spectacle which none without teares was able to behold; for the strongest still got the most, and the weakest bewailed their misery: for now famine was the greatest calamitie they indured. And nothing doth arme men more then shame: for during this famine, no reverence was had towards any man: for wives took the meat even out of their husbands mowthes, and children from their parents, and mothers even from their infants, which was the most lamentable thing of all. No body had now any compassion, neither did they spare their dearest infants, but suffered them to perish even in their armes, taking from them the very drops of life. Yet could they not eat thus in such secrecy, but presently some came to take away from them that whereon they fed. For if in any place they saw any doore shut, presently hereupon they conjectured that they in the house were eating meat, and forthwith breaking downe the doores they came in; and taking them by the throat, they took the meat already chewed, and ready to be swallowed down. The old men were driven away, and not permitted to keep and defend their food from being taken from them: the women were drawne up and down by the haire of the head, for that they hid betweene their hands some part of their meat, and would not forgo it. No pitie was now remaining, neither to old age nor infancy, but they took young babes eating, their mouth full of meat, and not permitting it to be taken out of their mowthes, and threw them against the ground. Now if any one had prevented these theeves, and eaten their meat before they could come at them, then they were more cruell; and the other so much more tyrannously handled, as having committed some greater offence against them. They also devised most barbarous and cruell torments to extort food from others: for they thrust sticks or such like into the cavities of mens yards and sharp thornie rods into their fundaments: and it is abominable to heare what the people endured to make them confesse one loaf of bread, or one handfull of corn which they had hidden.

A miserable kind of living, and a spectacle of great compassion.

D These miscreants did not yet for all this feel either hunger or thirst: for then these their impieties had been more tolerable, but they did it onely to exercise their crueltie, preparing six dayes food for themselves aforehand. Wherefore meeting such as had escaped the Roman watch in the night, and gone into the fields to gather weeds or herbs, when they again came into the Citie, and thought they had now escaped the danger of their enemies; they there took took from them the herbs they had gotten with the hazard of their lives, denying to give them any small part of that for which they had undergone such danger: and they required them for Gods sake to do it, yea, they thought it a benefite, if being thus robbed and spoyled, they did not also perish by the swords of these miscreants. These calamities the baser sort of people endured at the hands of the common souldiers: but the Nobles and chief men of the city were led unto the tyrants, and accused before them of betraying the Citie unto the Romanes; and so by some forged treason or other put to death. And many times their suborned accusers would testifie against them, that they purposed to flye unto the Romanes. And those that Simon robbed, he sent unto Iohn; and those that Iohn spoyled, he sent unto Simon: and so they did as it were one drinke unto another the blood of the people, and divide their dead carcasses between them; insomuch that they disagreed onely for their desire of rule and domination: but both conspired to do mischief and commit iniquitie. For he that did not give to the other part of that which by crueltie he had extorted from the miserable Citizens, was accounted impious: and he that received not part, did now grieve as sustaining losse, in not having a share in crueltie and impietie.

I am not able to recount all their iniquities: but briefly, I thinke that never any Citie endured the like, nor never any people since the memory of men were so cruell and barbarous: and finally, to the intent that their impiety unto strangers might seem the lesse, they spake evill of the nation of the Hebrews, and cursed them, and openly confessed themselves to be slaves, people of divers countries, united together in wickednesse, bastards and abortives of their nation. They overthrew the Citie, and forced the Romanes (though against their wils) to accept of this sorrowfull and heavy victory, and almost drew the fire into the Temple, as though it stayed from it too long. Neither did they weep or lament, when they saw the higher part of the Citie on fire; but many among the Romanes did with sorrow behold that sight which we will speak of heereafter, where we will describe the event of that businesse.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Jews that were crucified, and the Rampiers burnt.

HE mounts and rampiers that Titus built, did greatly advantage him: and although his souldiers endured some losse by the Jews who were upon the wall, yet he sent part of his horsemen, and commanded them to lay wait for the Jews that came out of the citie into the vallies to fetch food: and amongst them were also some fighting men. For now that which they could rob and take from the Citizens, was not sufficient for all of them: yet the greater part of them were poore people, who durst not flie unto the Romanes, for feare that some harme should thereupon betide their dearest friend, not induring to leave them behinde to be murdered by the thieves. Famine did now embolden them to go forth of the Citie, and now if onely remained for them to go forth privily, and be taken by the enemies. And being taken, necessitie forced them to fight for feare of torments, for they now thought it too late to request mercy: after the fight, they were beaten and tortured all waies possible, and then crucified before the citie wals. Titus deemed this calamitie most miserable: for every day 500. Jews and sometime more were taken; and yet did he not thinke it expedient to dismisse so great a multitude, nor to keep them who would be as a guard of guards. But the principall point for which he did not hinder this, was, that by this spectacle he might terrifie the Jews, and make them feare to suffer the like, except they did quickly render themselves and the Citie unto him. Wherefore the souldiers for a hatred which they conceived against our nation, crucified all they tooke, one after one fashion, and another after another, in derision. And the multitude of the captives was now so great, that there remained no more space to set crosses in, nor any more crosses to crucifie bodies upon. But the seditious Jews within the citie were so farre from relenting by this massacre, that rather their hearts were hereby more hardned; so that herewith they terrified the rest of the multitude: for they carryed the kindred of them that had fled unto the Romanes to the wals, and bade them behold how those were used that fled unto the Romanes: the same sight they also shewed unto them that desired peace, affirming that they whom the Romanes had so used, were those that fled unto them for succour, and not captives by them taken. This terrified many who desired to flie unto the Romanes, from effecting their desire; till such time as the truth hereof was known. Yet some presently went boldly unto the Romanes, as if they were intending to suffer death and torment at their hands, accounting that death coming unto them by their enemies hands, was farre more tolerable then the famine they endured.

A Hereupon Titus cut off many of the captives hands, and so sent them into the Citie unto Simon and Iohn, that their calamitie might testifie them to be captives, and not such as had fled and yeelded unto the Romanes, willing to admonish them at least now to yeeld, and not compell him to destroy the Citie: telling that in so doing, even now at the last they should save their own lives, countrey, and Temple, which had not the like in all the world: and he continually went about the rampiers hastening the workmen in their businesse, as though he presently meant to effect that in deeds, which in words he had spoken. The Jews that stood upon the wals, cursed both him and his father, reviling them, and affirming that they contemned death, and that they did chuse rather to die then to become bond slaves: and that whilest life lasted, they would as much as lay in them harm the Romanes, neither having care of themselves nor of their countrey; which Cesar sent them word were both presently to perish. Moreover, they said, that the whole world was a Temple dedicated to God, farre more excellent then that of theirs, which notwithstanding should be conserved by him that dwelt in it; whose help they also enjoying, would deride all his threatnings, which could not come to passe, God being the end of all. And thus opprobriously they exclaimed against the Romanes.

The Jews both curse Cesar and his father.

At this time arrived also Antiochus Epiphaneus, and with him many armed men; and beside them, guarded with a company called the Macedonians, who were of like age; and little older then young men, in their youth all trained up in arms, and armed after the Macedonian manner, whereof also they took their name: yet for the most part not able to answer the expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the King of Comagepe was the most fortunate and happie of all Kings that were subject unto the Romane Empire, till such time as he felt the frown of Fortune: who in his aged yeers shewed that none ought to be accounted happy before his death: he yet flourishing, his son (said he) marvelled that the Romanes did delay so long to assault the City, and enter the battered wals (for this young man was a fine warriour, and of exceeding strength, to the which he trusted too much, so that he did many things rashly.) Titus hereat smiled, and answered, that that was a labour not onely for the Romanes, but for all in common. After he had said thus, presently this young man Antiochus, as he was accompanied with his Macedonians, assaulted the wall, and himself with his strength and dexterity avoided the darts of the Jews, and cast his darts at them: but all his young men (onely a few excepted) were there slain: for ashamed of their boasting speeches, they continued longer in fight then it was expedient for them: at last, many being wounded retired themselves, now perceiving that the Macedonians to winne a victory had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romanes the twelfth day of May, began to build their rampiers: and labouring full seventeen whole dayes, with much ado they ended them the nine and twentieth day of the said moneth. For they builded four most huge rampiers, one of them over against Antonia, which was builded by the fifth legion opposite to the midst of the Struthian waters: another was builded by the twelfth legion, twenty cubits distant from the other. But the tenth legion, which was of more account then the two former, erected a mount opposite to the pond called Amygdalon on the North side: and the fifteenth legion made the fourth, thirty cubits distant from the other, over against the monument of the high Priest Iohn.

The insolence of Antiochus and the soldiers.

The mounts being thus finished, Iohn undermined that which was over against Antonia, and underpropped it with posts of wood, and filling the myne with wood, bitumen and pitch, he fired it: so the posts that held it up being burnt, the myne fell, and the mount also with a hideous noise fell into it: and first of all there arose a great smoak and dust, for the mynes did cover the flame, at last the fire having consumed the matter that covered it, the flame clearly appeared. The Romanes at this sudden and unexpected exploit were amazed, being grieved at it: so that thereby those who before made account of the victory, as though it had been theirs already, began to despair. Two dayes after, Simon and his associates did set upon the other rampiers: for thereon were planted Rammes, wherewith the Romanes began to beat the wals. Amongst the rest, a certain man named Tephanus of Garfus a citie of Galilee, and Megassarus, one of Queen Mariammes servants, and with them one of Adiabena the sonne of Nabarsus, who for his fortune was named Agiras, which signified lame: these three taking fire-brands, ranne unto the Engines, and there was none found in all the Romane army more valiant then these men, nor more terrible: for they ran amidst the throng of their enemies so boldly, as though they had gone amongst their friends, and never made any stay, but breaking thorow the midst of their enemies, they fired their Engines: and notwithstanding that on every side they were assaulted with darts and arrows, yet did they not give back, nor seek to avoid the danger, till such time as the fire had taken hold of the Engines.

gines. The flame mounting on high, the Romanes now came running out of their camp to succour their fellows: and the Jews upon the wall with darts and arrows hindred them, fighting with them that sought to quench the flame, nothing sparing their own bodies. The Romanes began to draw away the Rammes, their shelters being fired. And the Jews amidst the flames sought to keep them there: yet for all this the Romanes saved their Rammes. From thence the fire caught hold of the rampiers, and those that would have prevented it were burned: and the fire so increased, that it could not be extinguished; so the Romanes now environed with a flame, and despairing to rescue their works, retired themselves into their camp, and left them on fire. But the Jews were so much the more earnest, their number still increasing, by new supplies coming out of the City: and so encouraged by this their victory, they rashly adventured unto the Romanes camp, and assaulted the guard there. Which guard was a company placed round about before the camp in armour, and there was a law made, that whosoever of them forsook his place, he should lose his life: so that they esteeming rather to die a glorious death, then ignominiously to suffer a penall punishment, resisted very valiantly: so that many that had fled, retired themselves back again to fight, both for shame that they had forsaken their place, and for fear of punishment thereof: and placing Engines upon the rampier of their camp, they hindred the Jews from issuing out of the Citie any more: for they came out unarmed, having nothing to defend their bodies withall. For the Jews fought with whomsoever they met, and rashly running amongst their enemies pikes, they strooke them with their fists. For the Jews prevailed more by their hardinesse, then by their deeds: and the Romanes fled more for the Jews boldnesse, then for any harm they sustained by them.

Then Titus came from Antonia, where he had been to view a place to build another rampier, and he greatly blamed the souldiers, who having gotten their enemies walls, did now suffer themselves to be in danger in their own walls; and now forced to abide that, which earst the Jews did suffer, being now as it were broken out of prison: and so he with certain chosen men assaulted the enemies on one side, and they, though stricken upon the faces, yet did they not give back, but stoutly resisted him: and so joyning the battell, the dust was so thick, that none could see one another, nor any hear what was said for the cries and noise, so that now no man could discern his friends from his foes. The Jews persisted still in the battell, not for that they trusted to their force, or thereby prevailed, but because they were desperate. The Romanes on the other part took courage, and fought stoutly for shame, and for that Cesar himself was in danger amongst them. So that I think, that had not the Jews retired themselves into the Citie, the fury of the Romanes had then consumed the whole multitude. The Romanes were now sorrowfull for the losse of their rampiers, who in one hour had lost that, which with such labour and so long time they had been making: and many of their Engines being now displaced, they despaired to take the City.

CHAP. XIII.

TITUS now deliberated with his Captains what was to be done; and they that were most forward amongst them, thought it best with all the whole army to assault the walls: for that as yet the Jews had onely fought with one part of the army, but they were not able to withstand the force of the whole army, but would be all consumed with darts and arrows. The wiser sort again perswaded Titus to build rampiers: but others counselled the contrary, to hold themselves quiet there, and onely to keep all places about, that no food should be conveyed into the Citie, and so famish the Citie, and never fight with the enemy. For that the Jews being now desperate, and desiring to be slain, would not be overcome by force; or if not, to slay others which was worst of all. But Titus thought it a shame to lie there idle with so huge an army, and do nothing; yet he deemed it superfluous to fight with them who would willingly fight to be slain: and he could not make any mounts, because he wanted matter, and it was most difficult of all to guard every place about the Citie, that none could go forth, for that it could not be beleaguered round on every side, by reason of the difficult places, and huge compasse thereof, fearing also the dangers that so might ensue, the Jews issuing out of the City. For the Jews seeing their open wayes all guarded by the Romanes, they would devise some secret wayes, both urged thereunto by necessity, and also because they knew all places thereabout very well. And if so be that the Jews should secretly effect any thing to prejudice them, that then their siege was like to continue

- A so much the longer: so that he feared that the continuance of time would diminish the glory of his victorie. For though all these wayes might be taken, yet he preferred haste before glory: and if so be he would use celeritie and safety, that then it was needfull for him to compasse the whole citie round about with a wall: for so all wayes and passages might be hindred: and so the Jews seeing now no hope of safety, should either be compelled to yeeld the citie, or else be consumed with famine, otherwise he could not be in safety and at quiet, and that so he might erect mounts, having that wall to defend them. And if any one think that work difficult, and not to be achieved, let him consider that it did not become the Romans to make a base or slender piece of work: and that no man in the world could without labour effect any great matter, but God onely. Having with these speeches encouraged his Captains, he caused them to lead the souldiers, and dispose them all in these businesses. The souldiers had as it were some divine force and courage false upon them: for the Captains parting the circuit amongst them, not onely they, but the souldiers also did strive who should first effect their part. And every souldier laboured to please his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, and the Centurion the Colonell, and the Colonell to please the Captain, and the Captain to please Cesar, who every day went round about and beheld the work: and so beginning at the place called the Assyrians camp, where he was encamped, he drew a wall all about, even unto the new citie, and from thence by Cedron and mount Oliver, and so turned toward the South, and enclosed the mountain to the rock called Peristereonos, and the hill next adjoyning thereunto which hangeth over Siloa: and from thence bending his work into the West, he brought it down all along the valley of the fountain: from thence ascending to the monument of Ananus the high Priest where Pompey pitched his tents, and so brought it about by the North side of the Citie: and coming along unto the village called Erebinthonicus, he compassed the monument of Hered towards the East, and so joyned the wall unto his camp where he began. This wall was nine and thirtie furlongs about. Without this wall he builded also thirteene forts, every one ten furlongs in compasse. And all this whole work was finished in three dayes space, which desired moneths to have been builded in: so that the celerity in the building thereof doth make it scarcely credible. The citie being thus encompassed with a wall, and guards placed in every fort, Titus himself did still go round about the first watch, to see all things in good order: the second watch he allotted unto Alexander, and the third unto the Captains of the legions, and the watchmen appointed every one in his turn to sleep in: and so all night long some of them went about the Castle.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the famine in Ierusalem: and of the building of the second Rampire by the Romans,

- E HE restraint of liberty to passe in and out of the Citie, took from the Jews all hope of safety, and the famine now increasing, consumed whole households and families, and the houses were full of dead women and infants, and the streets filled with the dead bodies of old men: And the young men swollen like dead mens shadows, walked in the market place, and fell down dead where it happened. And now the multitude of dead bodies was so great, that they that were alive could not bury them, nor cared they for burying them, being now uncertain what should betide themselves. And many endeavouring to bury others, fell down themselves dead upon them as they were burying them. And many being yet alive, went unto their graves and there died. Yet for all this calamity, was there no weeping nor lamentation, for famine overcame all affections. And they who were yet living, without tears beheld those, who being dead, were now at rest before them. There was no noise heard within the citie, and the still night found all full of dead bodies: and which was most miserable of all, the theeves at night came and took away that which covered the dead bodies nakednesse, and went laughing away, and in their bodies they proved their swords, and upon pleasure onely thrust many thorow yet breathing. Yet if any had desired them to kill him, or to lend him a sword to kill himself, that so he might escape the famine, they denied him. And every one that died, as he was dying, fixed his eyes upon the Temple, and beheld it now with grief, leaving the seditious behinde them. The seditious now not able to endure the stink of the dead bodies that lay corrupted above the ground, first commanded that all such should be buried at the charges of the city: at last finding out place wherein to bury them all, they threw them over the walls into the ditch. When Titus, going about the walls, beheld all the ditch filled with dead mens bodies, he lamented; and lifting up his hands to heaven, he called God to witnesse, that it was not his doing. Such was the estate of the citie. Now the Romans, when none of the seditious durst make any more excursions, passed their time in joy and mirth: for they neither suffered famine nor sorrow, having abundance of corn, and all other necessities out of Syria, and the Provinces adjoining: and many standing before the wals, and shewing their abundance of victuals unto the Jews, did so much more encrease their famine. Yet were not the seditious people moved at these calamities: wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the Nation, and minding at least to save them that were left alive, hastned to take the citie, and so he began anew to build mounts, though he scarcely found matter to do it withall. For all the wood neer unto the citie, was consumed in the first works, so that now the souldiers were forced to fetch more wood 90. furlongs off; and onely against Antonia, were erected in four places four mounts greater then the former. Caesar went about and hastned the workmen, and now shewed the theeves that they were fallen into his hands. Yet for all this, they would not repent: and now as it were deprived of their wits and bodies, they used both as though borrowed, and not their own. For neither did any affection move their minds, nor any grief their bodies: for they rent and tore the dead bodies like dogs, and filled the prisons with weak and languishing people.

Of the massacre of the Jews, both within and without the Citie.

Simons cruelty against Matthias and his sonnes.

A last, Simon having tormented Matthias, put him to death, notwithstanding that by his means he had obtained the Citie. This Matthias was sonne unto Bethas a Priest whom the people for his fideliry towards them greatly esteemed of: who seeing the outrage of the Zelous towards the people, John being now joyned with them, perswaded the people to call in Simon to help them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they misdoubted no evill. And when he was come into the Citie, he held him for his enemy as well as the rest: notwithstanding, that by his onely advice he was received into the Citie, as though Matthias had onely done that of simplicitie. Wherefore calling him before the people, he accused him that he did favour the Romans, and so condemned him to die, not suffering him to clear himself; and put to death likewise his three sonnes with him, for the fourth was before this time fled unto Titus. Matthias requested Simon that he might be put to death before his sonnes: but Simon, in regard that by his means he had gotten the Citie, caused him to be executed last of all. And so he was killed upon the murdered bodies of his sonnes, in a place where the Romans might behold him: for so Simon commanded Ananias his executioner who was the sonne of Bamadus. This man was the most cruell of all Simons followers, who even when he was to kill Matthias, derided him, asking what they could now help him, to whom he sought to flie? and permitted not their bodies to be buried. After them Ananias a Priest the sonne of Maabaius a Noble man, and chief Secretary to the Councell, a valiant strong man and born at Emaus, and with him fifteen of the chiefest men in the Citie were put to death. They took also Josephs father and kept him in prison, and with the publike voice of a crier proclaimed, that no man should talk with him nor visit him, pretending fear of treason: and whosoever bewailed his estate, were put to death without any triall. It happened, a certain man called Judas the sonne of Iudas, who was one of Simons Captains, seeing this (who also kept a tower that Simon committed unto his charge, perhaps moved with compassion towards them that perished without desert, yet rather fearing his own life) assembled together ten of his most trusty companions, and said; How long shall we endure these calamities? Or what hope have we of life, in being trusty to a most impious man? Behold how famine doth take our Citie. The Romans are almost within our wals, and Simon is cruell and faithlesse; even towards them that have well deserved at his hands: with him we are in fear of punishment; if we flie unto the Romans, we shall assuredly be received into favour. Wherefore let us deliver the wall unto them, and save our selves and our Citie. Neither can Simon hereby sustain any great losse, in being punished a little sooner, then otherwise he should be, being now desperate of his own health and safetie. The ten men to whom in this maner he brake his minde, agreed hereunto, and so he in the morning sent the rest of his souldiers under his rule into divers places, that they might not perceive his intent, and he at the third hour of the day standing upon the tower, called the Romans. But some of the Romans proudly contemned their offer, and others scarcely beleaved them, and the rest made no speed to come. In the mean time

And Ioseph going about the wall, and coming thither (for he never ceased from requesting the Jews to remember their estate) he was strook upon the head with a stone, and so amazed with the blow, fell down: who beingalne down, presently the Jews made excursions out of the Citie, and had carried him away into the Citie, had not Titus sent men to defend him: and whilest they fought, Ioseph was carried away, scarcely knowing what was done. The seditious with loud cries rejoyced, as having slain him whose death they chiefly desired; and so they reported within the Citie. Hereupon the people were most sorrowfull, verily beleaving him to be slain, by whom they had confidence to flie unto the Romans.

the City.

B When Ioseph's mother who was in prison heard this, she said unto those of Jotapata that were her keepers, that she verily beleaved it, for that he was never taken alive by the Romans: yet secretly unto her maidens she wept, and said, that this benefit she received by having born a sonne, that she could not bury him by whom she hoped to have been buried herself. But this false report did not long grieve her, nor comfort the theeves: for Ioseph was quickly healed of his wound, and recovered; and shewing himself he cried unto them, that ere long they should finde that he would be revenged on them for his wound; yet he ceased not to exhort the people to obey the Romans, and yeeld: but the seditious seeing him alive were astonied, and the people conceived good hope. Many (present necessitie urging them) leapt off the walls and fled unto the Romans; divers, with stones going forth under pretence to fight with the Romans, yeelded themselves, who had harder fortune there then within the Citie, and were now more harmed by plentie of victuals which they found amongst the Romans, then with their famine they suffered in the Citie: for many became by famine all swollen, as though they had the dropsie, and presently filling their empty bodies they burst; and so all died, save onely those who being warie, did by little and little accustom their bodies to food, which they had long wanted. Yet they who thus escaped fell into another grievous misfortune: for one of the Jews that were fled unto the Romans, was found amongst the Syrians, gathering gold out of his own dung which he had swallowed, as is before said, for that the seditious did search all, and take that they could finde from them: and there was very great store of gold in the Citie, and that now was sold for twelve Atticks which before was worth twentie five. This device being discovered in one, presently a report was spread all over the whole camp, that the Jews that fled from the Citie, came full of gold. And now the Arabians and Syrians did rip the bellies of their poore suppliants, to see if they could finde any gold or silver within them. And I am perswaded that there was the greater calamitie befell the Jews then this was: for in one night the bellies of two thousand Jews were ript, Titus hearing of this crueltie, had caused the authors hereof to have been compassed round with horsemen, and slain with darts, and had the multitude of offenders been known, many more of them should have been punished, then of the Jews that were so murdered. Wherefore he called together the Leaders of the souldiers that came to help him, and the Roman Captains (for some of the Romans also did commit this fault) and said unto them in anger, that if any of his souldiers did commit any such acts for uncertain gain, and were not ashamed that their armour should be made of gold and silver: or if the Arabians in these warres against strangers did what they pleased, and presently cause the infamy of their vile facts to redound unto the Romans, they committing such murthers, & exercising their hatred against the Jews (for now every one that bare arms under him, were defamed with this vile report) he declared unto them, that such being hereafter found in that fact, should be put to death. Also he commanded his own legions to make enquire, who were suspected among them for this matter, and bring him word thereof. But avarice is not terrified by fear of punishment, and cruell people have naturally a desire of lucre and gain, and no one calamitie may be compared to the desire of wealth; yet sometime it is bridled and restrained for fear. But now God, who had given over the people to perdition, suffered all things to be turned to their destruction: for that which Cesar did so streightly forbid, was still secretly committed against the poor Jews that fled for mercy unto the Romans. So that now whosoever fled out of the Citie, the souldiers first looking about them, lest any of the Romans should see them, ript their bellies, and so got an ungodly and impious booty; yet in very few did they finde that they sought for; and the most of them that were slain, had no gold nor silver found within them. And this mischief caused many that fled unto the Romans to return again into the Citie.

Of the sacrilege committed about the Temple, and the dead bodies cast out of the Citie and of the famine.

WHEN John could rob no more, nor get any spoil from the citizens, whom he had robbed of all they had, he presently fell to sacrilege, and took many gifts that were bestowed upon the Temple, and carried away sacred vessels for Divine Service, as cups, plates, tables, and the cruets of gold that Augustus and his wife sent. So that now a Jew robbed and spoiled the Temple of all gifts wherewith the Roman Emperours and other Nations had honoured it: affirming unto his associates, that without fear they might use the holy things of the Temple, seeing they fought for God and the Temple. And therefore it was lawfull for them to be fed by the riches of the Temple. Moreover, that it was lawfull for them to spend the holy wine and byl which the Priests reserved for Divine Sacrifice: which he distributed in the Temple amongst the multitude, and they without fear were anointed therewith, and drank thereof. I will not cease to speak that which grief compelleth me. I verily think, that had the Romans forbore to have come against these seditious, that either the earth would have swallowed the Citie up, or some deluge have drowned it, or else the thunder and lightning which consumed Sodom, would have light upon it: for the people of the Citie were far more impious then the Sodomites. In brief, by their desperation and obstinacy the whole nation was extinguished. What need I recount every particular misery? Mannas the sonne of Lazarus, flying to Titus out of the gate that was committed unto his custody, and yeelding himself unto him, recounted unto Titus, that from the time that the Romans army was placed neer the City, from the fourteenth day of Aprill, untill the first of July, were carried out of that gate he kept, a hundred, fifteen thousand and fourscore dead bodies; yet was he not the keeper of the gate, but being appointed to pay for the burying of the dead at the charges of the City, was forced to number the dead bodies. For others were buried by their parents, and this was their buriall, to cast them out of the Citie, and there let them lie. And certain Noblemen flying unto Titus after him, reported that there were dead in the Citie six hundred thousand poor folks which were cast out of the gates, and the others that died were innumerable: and that when so many died that they were not able to bury them, that then they gathered the bodies together in the greatest houses adjoyning, and there shut them up. And that a bushell of corn was sold for a talent, which is six hundredth crowns: and that after the City was compassed with a wall, that now they could not go out to gather any more hearbs, many were driven to that necessitie, that they raked sinks and privies to finde old dung of oxen to eat, and so the dung that was loathsome to behold, was their meat. The Romans hearing this, were moved to compassion; yet the seditious within the Citie, who beheld this miserable sight, were nothing moved, nor repented not, but suffered them to be brought to that calamitie: for their hearts were so blinded by the providence of God, that they could not see what hanged over their heads, and over their Citie.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the wals: and how the mounts were burned: and how Sabinus assaulted the wall.

THE misery of Ierusalem every day increased, the seditions being by reason of their misery more and more incited against the people: for now the famine was not onely amongst the people, but amongst them also. And it was a miserable sight to see the multitude of dead bodies heaped together in the Citie, from which came a pestilent and infectious smell, so that it hindered the souldiers from making excursions. For they were forced to tread upon dead bodies, as though they were to march a long a field covered with dead carcases. Having now embrewed their hands in the blood of their countrymen, they prepared to resist and fight with their enemies, and (as it seemeth to me) hereby upbraiding God, in that he so deferred to punish them. For the greatest part of them did now fight more earnestly then before, not for hope of safetie, but as despairing of all. The Romans though much troubled to get wood to build withall, yet did they in one and twentie dayes finish their mounts, having cut down all the woods near the Citie by ninety furlongs. It was miserable to behold that countrey and place, before all beset with trees and fertill plants; now to lie plain like a desart, all cut down: neither was there any stranger that before-time had seen Judæa, and the beautifull suburbs of Jerusalem, who now beholding it, could abstain from tears, or not lament the wofull change so farre different from the former. For now this warre extinguished utterly all signes of beautie: neither could one coming suddenly now know the place, which he well knew before.

When the mounts were ended, both the Romans and the Jews greatly feared: the Jews, for that except they were destroyed, their Citie would be presently taken; the Romans, for that if these were overthrown, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter: and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their minds with many griets and molestations. But the Romans were more grieved at the calamitie of the Citie, then the citizens within: for the Jews notwithstanding these miseries did nevertheless stoutly defend their walls: but the courages of the Romans failed, when they saw that the Jews policy made their mounts unprofitable, that the strength of the walls resisted their engines, that the Jews boldnesse overcame their strength in fight; and especially, seeing that the Jews having endured such calamitie, famine, and miserie, were still more couragious then before: so that they deemed their strength not to be overcome, and that their minds were invincible, who were hardned and encouraged by miserie. For who were able to abide their forces in prosperitie, who by adversitie were incited to vertue? Wherefore the Romans made a stronger watch about their mounts. But John followers who were in the castle Antonia, fearing what might ensue if the wall were battered, prevented it in what they could, before the Rammes were set up: and taking firebrands in their hands, they assaulted the mount; but deceived with a vain hope, they retired themselves. For first of all they seemed to disagree among themselves; so that they came from their wals one after another, and some space between every one; so that they came softly and fearfully, and briefly, not after the maner of the Jews: for they wanted courage, rashnesse, and flocking together at once, which is proper unto all that Nation, and so came more soberly, and with lesse courage then they were wont. They did also finde the Romans more couragious then of late, who so defended their mounts with their bodies and weapons, that it was not possible to come and fire them; and every one was fully determined not to shrink out of his place till he was slain. For besides that if so be that work were destroyed, they had no hope left to build more, they all accounted it a shame that their vertue should be overcome by subtiltie, or their weapons by rashnesse and temeritie, or their skill by a multitude, or the Romans by the Jews. Also they had engines to cast darts at them as they came down their wals. And when any one of the Jews that was slain fell down, he hindred them that followed, and the danger of him that went before terrified them that came after. They also that rashly adventured within the shot of a dart, either were terrified, with the discipline, and multitude of their enemies, or else wounded with their darts: and so they all retired, one accusing another of cowardinesse, and achieved nothing.

The first day of July the city was assaulted: and the Jews being now retired, the Romans set up their Rammes, notwithstanding that they were assaulted from Antonia with stones, fire and sword, and whatsoever their enemies in that extremitie could finde. For though the Jews had great confidence in their walls, as that they could not be battered, yet did they not permit the Romans to place their Rammes against them. And the Romans being perswaded that the Jews so laboured, because they knew their wals to be weak, and lest Antonia by the breach of the wall should be hurt, did strive to place them against the wals. But the wall would not yeeld unto the Ramme: yet did the Romans safely and without danger (notwithstanding that many darts were cast at them from off the wals) persist to beat the wall with their Rammes: who being below and seeing the stones broken with the force of their engines, they shielded themselves with their bucklers, and so some with their hands pulled the stones out of the wall, some digged under the foundation thereof: and when four stones with much labour were broken and shaken, the night hindred both parties from doing any more at that time, and in it the wall now shaken with the Ram (in the place which John had undermined to destroy the mounts, the myne setting) fell down. So that fell out otherwise then either part expected: For the Jews, who indeed had cause to be sorrowfull for the myne of the wall, and for that they did not prevent that mischance, were joyfull and

A courageous, as though Antonia did yet remain firm and strong: And the Romans rejoycing for this unexpected fall, were again dismayed, seeing the other wall that John had built within, yet they judged it easier to be taken then the former, but no man durst ascend it, for that he who first assaulted it, was certain to die. Titus, thinking that by hope and perswasion his souldiers might be encouraged, and knowing, many times promises and exhortations make men forget danger, and sometime to contemne death it self, he called together the most valiant of all his souldiers, and spake thus unto them as followeth: Fellow souldiers, it is manifest cowardhnesse to exhort men to enterprize a thing without danger, both in them that are exhorted, and in him that exhorts: for exhortations are onely to be used in doubtfull affairs, wherein it is praise-worthy for every man to adventure himself. So that I confesse it is hard for you to ascend the wall: yet will I shew you that it is a glorious death to die in such a fight, and especially it becometh them that are desirous to winne honour: and that they that first adventure valiantly to do it, shall not go away unrewarded. And first let this move you which terrifieth others, to wit, the patient minde of the Jews, and their constancy in adversity. For it is a shame for the Roman souldiers, who in time of peace practise themselves in warlike feats, and are accustomed in warre to get the victorie, now to be overcome by the Jews; and that in the end of the victory, we having also God to help us: for all our harms proceed from the Jews desperation, and their destruction and calamitie by Gods favour and your valour is every day increased. For what else is betokened by their sedition amongst themselves, their famine, the fall of their wals without our engins to batter them, and the siege it self, then the wrath of God towards them, and his favour towards us? Wherefore it is unseemly for you either to give place to your inferiours, or to betray Gods favour and furtherance. Is it not a shame that the Jews, who, were they conquered, sustained no great reproach, as being accustomed to serve and obey others, should so valiantly contemne death, lest they should hereafter suffer or endure the like; and many times boldly to adventure and make excursions even among the midst of us, not for hope they have to overcome us, but onely to shew their valour: and we, who have conquered almost the earth and sea, to whom it is an infamy not to be victorious, to lie idle, never making valiant assault upon our enemies, but being thus armed, to expect till fortune and famine deliver them into our hands? Especially seeing that by under-going a little danger, all will be ours. If we get into Antonia, we have taken the city. For suppose that we were then to fight against them that are within the city (which I do not think) we having gotten the higher part of the citie, being above our enemies head, are then assured of a perfect victorie over them. I omit now their commendations who have been slain in warres, and their immortality whom martiall furie hath deprived of this life: and those that do not so think, I pray that they may die of some evill death in peace, whose souls are condemned to be interred with their bodies. For what valiant man knoweth not that the soul of him that dies in warre, is presently received into the most pure airie element, and from thence carried and placed among the starres of heaven, and the good and valiant ghosts do alwayes assist his posterity? And that all that in peace do die of some disease and sickness, their souls are kept in the bowels of the earth in darknes, notwithstanding that they be most just and pure: and presently they are forgotten, and their life and memorie together with them extinguished. Seeing therefore that we are all certain to die, and that to die by the sword is a more easie death, then to die by any disease, why should we deprive our selves of this opportunitie, seeing that at last we must necessarily forgo our lives as due debt unto the destinies? And thus I have spoken as though it were impossible to escape with life, you doing your endeavours, yet they that bear the mindes of men, can finde means to save themselves even in the greatest dangers. For first of all, that part of the wall that is false may easily be entred, and the wall new built is not hard to be thrown down: and many of you together enterprizing this work, may one exhort and help another, and your audacity and courage will quickly daunt the enemies heart: and perhaps may get us the victory if we get this one place without bloodshed. For they will not resist us if we offer to ascend the wall: and let us but effect any one exploit either secretly or openly, and the Jews will never more endure us, though we be but few in number. And I would be ashamed if I did not so reward him that doth first begin, as to make all that are in our armie to envy his happinesse: and from henceforth I decree, that whosoever escapeth, shall be Governour over them that are now his equals, and whoso is slain in this quarrell, I will do him great honour.

Titus having thus spoken the rest of the multitude feared the greatnes of the danger: but one of them that warred in the companies, named Sabinus, a Syrian borne, a man of excellent strength and courage; yet of so small stature, that if one had seen him, they would have deemed deemed him unfit to have been a souldier: for he was of very smal stature and of black colour, but he had a minde far bigger then his body, and strength scarce able to be contained in so little roome. This Sabinus rising up, said, I offer my self unto thee, O Cæsar, first of all to ascend the wall, and that with a willing minde, requesting that my fortune may assist my strength and minde: yet if fortune shall hinder my enterprize, know that I die not against my expectation, but that I will gladly give my life for thee. When he had so said, he took his shield in his left hand, and holding it above his head, with his drawn sword in his right hand, about the sixth houre of the day he went unto the wall: and eleven men followed him, who onely envied his vertue. But Sabinus with a divine fervour of spirit went before them all; notwithstanding that on every side the Jews upon the wall cast an infinite number of darts at him, and rowled down upon him huge stones, which did strike down some of the eleven that followed him. But Sabinus, meeting the darts and pestering arrows, yet did not remit his force, till such time as he had gotten to the top of the wall, and put the enemies to flight: who, terrified with his strength and courage, and indeed thinking that more had come up after him, fled. Wherein, who may not justly blame Fortune, and accuse her, as envying at vertuous acts? For this man failed not of his purpose, yet was he stricken with a stone, and thrown down flat upon his face most violently with a great noise: so that now the Jews seeing him alone, and lying on the ground, returned again, and shot at him on every side: and he kneeling upon his knees, and covering himself with his shield, did first of all revenge himself upon his enemies, and wounded many that came neer him, till with wounding them he was so weary, that he could strike no longer, and so at last was slain with arrows: a man who for his valour deserved better fortune, and died as valiantly as his enterprize was couragious. Those that were left of his company, having almost gotten to the top of the wall, were slain with stones, and the rest being wounded, were carried into the campe. And this was done the third day of July.

CHAP. II.

How the Romans assaulted Antonia, and how they were driven back from thence by the Jews.

Two daies after, twenty of the watchmen which guarded the mounts, two horsemen, and one trumpetter, gathered themselves together: and about the ninth houre of the night, they came by the ruines into Antonia without any resistance: and finding the first watchmen asleep, they slew them, and got the wall, and commanded the trumpetter to sound, by which sound the rest of the watchmen were awaked, and fled for fear, before they saw what company of the Romans was gotten upon the wall: and the sound of the trumpet perwaded them, that a great multitude of enemies were come up the wall. Cæsar, hearing the sound of the trumpet, presently armed his souldiers, and accompanied with his chief Captains, and a company of chosen men, he ascended the wall. The Jews fled into the inner Temple, and the Romans also brake in amongst them by the myne that John had made to destroy the mounts of the Romans. And the followers both of John and Simon, did courageously drive them back: for they thought it the utter ruine of all, that the Romans were now gotten into the holy place, which indeed was the beginning of their victory. So they began a sore fight, even in the very entrance, the Romans striving to get the inner temple, and the Jews endeavouring to beate them back towards Antonia. And now arrows, darts, and spears, nothing availed either part, but they both fought it out at handy blows with swords: and in that conflict no man could discern on which side any one fought, for the souldiers on both parts were mingled together, and for the straightness of the place, could not keep their roomes: for there was such a noise that no man could hear one another, and many were slain on both parts, and the dead bodies of those that were slain, and their weapons falling with them, did hurt many that trod upon them; and whosoever had the worst, presently cried out pitifully, and the victors shouted for joy: neither was there any place to lie or follow, the fight was such, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreover, they that stood in the forefront of the battell, were either of necessitie to kill or be killed: for there was no void space left between the two armies. At last the Jewes courage overcame the Romans skill, and they were all beaten back (having fought from the ninth houre of the night, unto the seventh houre of the day.) The Jews were encouraged to fight for fear they should be overcome. And that parcell of the Roman army (for as yet the legions were not come) thought it sufficient at that time to have gotten the Castle of Antonia.

A Here was one Julian, a Centurion, born in Bithynia, of good parentage, who (as my self well knew) was most valiant of all, both in strength of body and skill, and courageous minde. This Julian, seeing now the Romans to have the worst (standing by Titus in Antonia) he presently leapt down, and all alone pursued the Jews who had the victory, into the inner Temple. And the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force and courage, not to have been a man. But he amongst the midst of them, slew whomsoever he light on, one of them for haste casting down another. So that this his deed seemed admirable to Cesar, and terrible to his enemies. Yet did that destiny befall him which no man can escape; for having his shooes full of sharp nailes, as other souldiers have, running upon the pavement, he slipt and fell down, his armour in the fall making a great noise: whereat his enemies, who before fled, now turned again upon him. Then the Romans in Antonia fearing his life, cried out: but the Jews many at once strook him with swords and spears. And he defended many blows with his shield, and many times attempting to rise, they strook him down again: yet as he lay, he wounded many; neither was he quickly slain, because all parts of his body, which being wounded might cause present death, were armed, and shrunk in his neck a long time till the rest of his body being cut off, and no man helping him, his strength failed. Cesar was very sorrowfull to see a man of so great force and fortitude slain in the sight of such a multitude: and that the place wherein he was, hindered him from helping Julian: and others that might have helped him, durst not for fear. At last, when Julian had a long time striven with death, and wounded many of them that slew him, he was with much ado killed, leaving behinde him a renowned memory, not onely amongst the Romans and Cesar, but also amongst his enemies. Then the Jews took his dead body, and beat back the Romans and shut them in Antonia. In this battell one Alexas and Gypshaus, two of Iohns company, fought valiantly, and of Simons company Malachias and Iudas, the sonne of Merton, and Iames the sonne of Sosa Captain of the Idumæans, and two brethren of the zealous, the sonnes of Iairus, Simon and Iudas.

JOSEPHS speech, perswading the Jews to yeeld their City: and how many of them fled unto the Romans.

E After that Titus had commanded his souldiers to pull down the foundations of Antonia, and make an easie entrance for the whole army: he called Ioseph unto him (for he understood, that day being the seventeenth of July, that the Jews were wont to celebrate a certain feast to God, which they called Entelechismu, and that it was not solemnized for want of men; so that the people greatly mourned therefore) and again commanded him to tell Iohn that whereof before he had sent him word, to wit, that if he desired to fight, he should have libertie to come, with what multitude he pleased; so that the Citie and the Temple might not both perish with him, willing him now to desist from prophaning the holy place, and from sinning against God: sending him also word, that if he so pleased, he would grant him leave to celebrate the festivity which had been now long time omitted, and that by what company he pleased. Ioseph, to the intent that not onely Iohn might heare this offer of Titus, but also the rest of the people, he stood in an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue he recounted unto the Jews Cesars pleasure, earnestly requesting them to spare their countrey, and forbid the fire now ready to take hold of their Temple, and to offer the accustomed sacrifices unto God. When he had thus said, the people were very sorrowfull, and every one held his peace, not knowing what to say. But the tyrant Iohn having used many rayling speeches against Ioseph, at last he answered, that he need not fear the destruction of the Temple and Citie, seeing that it belonged to God.

Titus willeth Iohn to come out to fight, left with him the Citie and temple should perish also.

Then Ioseph with a loud voice cried out, True it is; you have kept it pure, and unprophaned for God, and the holy things you have kept inviolate, neither hast thou committed any iniquitie against him, from whom thou expectest help, but hast offered solemn sacrifice unto him: If any man should take from thee thy daily food, no doubt thou wouldest account him thy enemy: canst thou then hope that God, whom thou hast deprived of daily sacrifice, will will assist thee in these wars? Dost thou impute these offences to the Romans? why? they even now do defend our religion, and command sacrifice to be offered, which thou hast forbidden. Who doth not bewaile this unexpected change, and lament our city? Strangers and enemies correct thy impiety, and thou a Jew born, and brought up in our law, art more cruel then they. But consider, John, it is no shame to repent thy wickedness in extremities: and at the last cast, if thou be desirous to save thy countrey, thou hast a good example of Jechonias, sometime King of the Jews, who, when the Babylonians warred against him, of his own accord went out of the city before it was taken, and willingly endured captivity with all his family and kindred onely, lest he should betray these holy places to his enemies, and behold the Temple fired. And for this act of his, he is of sacred memory among the Jews, and hath thereby gained immortall credit amongst all his posterity. This is a good example, O John, although danger be at hand: and I will promise thee also pardon from the Romans, onely remember that I thy countyman admonish thee, and promise this unto the Jews: behold who is the author and counsellor hereof. God forbid that ever I should so live a captive, that I should not live according to the laws of our countrey. Yet thou art again incensed against me, and exclaimst on me, and curstest me. But true it is, I deserve worse then this, who seek to perswade contrary unto the determination of Gods providence, and strive to save them whom his sentence hath condemned. Who is ignorant of the writings of the ancient Prophets and their prophecies, now hanging over this wretched citie? For then it is foretold by them to be destroyed, when we murder our own nation: and now not onely the city, but also the Temple is full of your dead bodies. Certainly it is God, God it is that together with the Romans, bringeth in fire to purge this citie filled with iniquitie.

Joseph thus crying with tears and lamentations, he could speak no more for sobbing: And the Romans compassionating his sorrow and affliction, were astonished. But John and his confederates were so much the more incited against the Romans, and sought to take Joseph, yet his speech did move many of the nobles; and divers, fearing the seditious watchmen, remained still where they were, making full account both of their own destruction, and the subversion of the city. Yet some there were, who finding opportunitee, fled unto the Romans: amongst whom were two Priests, Joseph and Iesus, and three sons of Ismael the Priest, who was beheaded at Cyren, and foure sonnes of Matthias the Priest, and one of the other Matthias, who escaped unto the Romans before his father was put to death by Simon Giora, with his three sonnes, as is before said: and many other nobles revolted with the Priests, whom the Emperour received very courteously, and sent them into Gophna; knowing that it was a grief for them to converse amongst people of divers maners from them, and willed them to remain there, and promised every one of them great possessions after the wars were ended. So they joyfully departed unto the place appointed. But the seditious, for that they were not seen, reported unto the people, that they who had fled unto the Romans were slain, meaning hereby to terrifie the rest from fleeing to them: and thus their device a while prevailed, as their former did; and they that faine would, durst not now flee for fear. But afterward when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and commanded them to go about the walls with Joseph, and shew themselves unto the people; then many of the Jews fled unto the Romans. And after they had gathered themselves together, standing all before the Romans, they besought the seditious with tears, first to receive the Romans into the Citie, and save their countrey: or if it pleased them not, at least to depart out of the Temple, and to deliver it up unto them. For the Romans durst not, except necessitie urged them thereto, fire the holy Temple. But their malice against the Romans encreasing, and saying against them that had fled unto them, they planted all their engines to cast stones, darts and arrows upon their holy porches. So that all the void space about the Temple was filled with dead bodies like a sepulchre, and the Temple it self resembled a castle, and they now with their weapons having their hands imbrowed with the blood of their countymen, presumed to enter into the Sanctuary where none ought to come: and they became so injurious against their own laws, that look what indignation the Jews ought to have conceived against the Romans, if they had so prophaned the holy places, the same they caused the Romans to have against them, for doing the like. For there was not one amongst the Roman souldiers, that did not with reverence behold the Temple, and adore it, and that did not heartily wish that the thieves would repent themselves before it was too late. Moreover, Titus pitying the seditious, once again spake unto John and his adherents, saying: O ye impious people, have you not invaded the Temple about with a cloister? have not you your selves in Greek and our language engraven in tables, forbidden all men to enter into those limits? did not we licence you to kill any man that should passe them, notwithstanding that he were a Roman? Why then, ye wicked

A wicked wretches, do you tread upon dead mens bodies within your Temple? Or wherefore have you polluted the temple with the blood of strangers, and of your countymen? I call my countrey gods to witnesse, and him who sometime dwelt in this place, if ever there were any (for now I am perswaded there is none;) I call also my army to witnesse, and protest to the Jews that are with me, and to your selves, that I will not compell you to violate these sacred things: but that if your army will depart from this place, that then no Roman shall come in to these holy places, nor commit any thing in contumely of them, but I will preserve the Temple for you against your wils.

CHAP. V.

How the battell was renewed, the Rampiers being again builded, and of the excursions of the Jews.

B JOSEPH having delivered these words of Titus to the Jews, the seditious thinking that they proceeded not of good will, but of fear, began to be more proud hereat. Then Titus, seeing they neither pitied themselves, nor the Temple, determined again to fight, though very loath so to doe; yet could he not bring all his army against them, the roome was so little. Wherefore out of every hundred he made choice of thirty of the strongest among them, and over every thousand he appointed a Colonell, and made Cerealius their Captain or Generall, commanding him at the ninth houre of the night to assault the watchmen of the enemy. Also he himself would have gone down with them armed; but his friends, and the Captains about him, foreseeing the great danger he might fall into, would not permit him: affirming, that he might do more good sitting in Antonia, and encouraging the souldiers that fought, then if he should go and endanger himself: for every man being in the view of the Emperour, would fight more courageously. Titus was herewith perswaded, telling the souldiers that the onely cause he went not with them was this, that he staid behinde to view and judge every ones valour and vertue, and to the intent that no one behaving himself valiantly should go away unrewarded, nor any coward escape unpunished, but that he himself would be a beholder of every mans vertue, and a witnesse thereof, who was their Lord either to reward or punish.

D Then went he unto a watch-tower in Antonia, from whence he beheld what was done. But they whom Titus sent did not finde the watchmen asleep, as they hoped, but with a crie, assaulted the Romans that came against them: and at this noise they awaked their fellows, who came in whole companies to assist them, and made excursions upon their enemies. So the Romans sustained the violence of their first companies: but the second that came, fell upon their own fellowes, and used them like their enemies: for no man could know one anothers voice for the noise there, neither could one see another by reason it was night: and moreover, some were blinded; with fury, some with anger, some with fear: wherefore every one strook him that met him, without any respect. And the Romans received small damage thereby, because that they were defended with their shields, and remembered one anothers watch-word. But the Jews fell on every side, shewing themselves rash as well in excursions as in their retiring; so that many times one of them took the other to be his enemy, every one falling upon him that retired, as though he had been a Roman, assaulting them in the dark. Briefly, more were wounded by their fellowes then by their enemies, til day breaking that every one knew his companion; and each one keeping his rank, did then betake themselves to their darts and arrows. Neither part gave back, nor was wearied with labour: but many Romans together and apart, did in the view of the Emperour shew their courage, every man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaved himself valiantly. The Jews fought stoutly, both for that they feared their own imminent danger, if they were overcome, and the destruction of the Temple: and John standing by, encouraged them to fight, some with blows, other some with threatnings. They fought most commonly with handy blows; yet fortune often changed: for neither part had either far to flee, or any space to follow them that fled. The Romans in Antonia cried unto their fellows that fought the battell, Now for the hope of victory: presently encouraging them to stand to it, when they began to give back; so it was as it had been a Theater of warre: for Titus, and they with him, beheld all that was done, so at last, in the fifth houre of the day the fight ceased, having continued from the ninth houre of the night, neither party forsaking the place where first they began battell, neither any part having the victory. Many Romans there fought courageously, and amongst the Jews these that follow: Indas, the sonne of Merson, Simon, the sonne of Iosias, and Iacob, and Simon Idumeans; this, the sonne of Cathla, but James was the sonne sonne of Sofa: and all these were of Simons company, and of Iohns followers Gythens and Alexas; and of the Zelous, Simon the sonne of Isirius. But the seventh day, the rest of the Romans pulling down the foundations of Antonia, made a large entrance for the rest of the army. And the legions coming unto the wall, presently began to raise mounts, one against the corner of the inner Temple, which was situate North and East: and another against the gallery on the North side betwixt the two porches: and the other two, one against the porch of the West side of the outward Temple, the other against the North porch. So with much toile and labour they finisht this work, fetching wood to build it withall 100. furlongs off. And many times they were endamaged by treachery, not being wary by reason of their victory: and the Jews despairing of themselves every houre, more and more were encouraged. For many of the horsemen going either to get wood or hay, while they were about it, they took the bridles from off their horses, and permitted them to feed till they had ended their businesse; and presently the Jews issuing out in troups upon them, took them away.

Titus seeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens horses were stolne rather by their negligence then their enemies valour: wherefore he thought by the severe punishment of one, to make others look better to their horses. And so he put to death one of the souldiers that had lost his horse: by whose punishment the rest of the souldiers being terrified, kept their horses better. For after that, when they went about any businesse, they never left their horses in the pastures, but kept alwaies with them. Thus the Romans assaulted the Temple, and builded there mounts. The day following, certain of the seditious, who now could get no more booties in the citie, and now also began to taste of hunger, assaulted the Romans that were placed towards mount Olivet about the eleventh houre of the day: for they hoped to take them unawares, as being now at dinner. But the Romans perceiving their intent, came out of their places, and resisted them who attempted violently to break in upon them over the wall: so that there was a hot fight, and many other deeds were done on either party, the Romans having both strength and knowledge in warlike affairs, the Jews led with a desperate fury: and shame forced the Romans to fight, and need compelled the Jews: for the Romans accounted it a shame not to overcome the Jews, who were as it were fallen into their hands; and the Jews thought it the onely way to save their own lives, to break down the wall by force. And one of the horsemen, called Pedanius, the Jews being put to flight and driven into the vally, pursued them with his horse as fast as he could gallop, and overtook a young man, one of his enemies, being heavy of body, armed all over; and taking him about the ankle, he carried him violently away: thereby shewing the strength of his arme and of the rest of his body, & his skilfull chivalry, & so brought the captive unto Cesar as a present. Titus admiring Pedanius his strength, and punishing the captive for having attempted to assault the wall, he now hastened to assaile the Temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to dispatch the mounts. In the mean time the Jews being ill handled in the former wars, and war still increasing to the overthrow of the Temple, they did, as the custome is in a putrified body, prevent the plague from going any further, by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the porch that reached from the North unto the East, joyned unto Antonia: which they firing separated it 20. cubits from it, having now with their own hands begun to cast fire into the holy place. Two daies after, which was the 24. day of the aforesaid moneth, the Romans set the porch on fire, and the fire having gone fourteen cubits, the Jews pulled down the top thereof, and not desisting from their accustomed works, they pulled down all adjoyning unto Antonia; when it was easie for them, and that they ought to have hindred the fire. The porch being on fire, they permitted so much to be burned, as they thought good for their purpose. The fight about the Temple never ceased, many excursions were made one against each other.

About this time, a certain Jew of low stature, & to see to a cōtemptible person, every way an abject, both by reason of his base parentage and otherwise, named Jonathan, going to the monumēt of Iohn the Priest, dared the strongest amongst the Romans to come & fight a single combat with him. The Romans that beheld him, disdained him: yet some amongst them (as it is commonly seen) were afraid of him: others wisely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was desirous to die: for they that were desperate, neither fought advisedly, nor had the fear of God before their eyes: and so that it was not a sign of valor, but of overmuch hardines, to fight with such a one, whom though they overcame, yet they could win no credit but with infamy hazard themselves to be vanquished. So a long time none of the Romans came against him, and he upbraided them of cowardlinesse. At last, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Roman horsemen, named Pudens, disdaining his insolency, and perhaps also for that

A that he was of little stature, came against him, and fighting with him, fortune frowned upon him, so that he was laught to scorn by his fellow, for he falling down, Jonathan slew him; and setting his foot upon the dead body, with his left hand he flourished his shield, and with his right his bloody sword: and striking his weapons one against another; he insulted over the Romane army, and over the dead body, upbraiding the Romanes, so long till Priscus a Centurion, as he was thus vaunting, shot him thorow with an arrow, and so he fell down dead upon the body of his enemy: at which deed, both the Romanes and the Jews raised a confused cry or noise. So Jonathan here shewed how quickly revenge pursued the felicity of warlike victory, falling out contrary to all reason.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romanes through the deceit of the Jews were consumed with fire, and of one Artorius.

Here seditions that kept the Temple, did now every day openly in fight resist the Romanes that kept the mounts; and the 27. day they devised this stratagem; They filled the void part of the East porch of the Temple with dry wood and brimstone, and bitumen, and then fled out of it as not able longer to resist. Wherefore many of the Romanes rashly pursued the Jews that fled, and with ladders got into the galleries. But the wiser sort considering that the Jews had no just occasion to flee, kept their place. The porch being now full of Romanes that were got up into it, the Jews gave fire to the wood and brimstone, and upon a sudden all the porch was compassed with the flame: so that the Romanes who were out of danger were hereat amazed, and those that were amidst the flames became desperate; and invironed with the flames, some sought to run back into the town, othersome unto the enemies; others kil'd themselves so preventing the fury of the fire, and presently the flame overtook those that sought to flee. Cesar, though offended at the souldiers for having ascended into the porch unbidden, yet seeing them die so woefully in the flames, he compassionated them. And although that the fire could not be quenched, yet the poore souldiers dying amongst the flames were hereat comforted, in that they perceived him to be sorrowfull for them, for whom they had lost their lives. For they beheld him crying to their fellows to help to extinguish the fire, and he himself laboured what he could to do it; so that every one esteemed his sorrow and lamentation for them as much as a sumptuous funerall: but some escaped the fire and got into the largest part of the porch; yet invironed round about with Jews, having long resisted, though with many wounds; yet in the end they were all slain.

The Jews fill the void part of the East porch with dry wood, sulphure and bitumen.

The Romanes calamity in the fire.

Cesar hath compassion of the Romanes that were in the fire.

E At last a young man named Longus, was an honour to all this misery: and notwithstanding that every one that there perished deserved particularly to be remembred, yet he shewed himself the most valiant of them all. The Jews were desirous to kill this man for that he was strong, and willed him to come down unto them, swearing unto him to spare him. But his brother Cornelius, who stood on the other side, entreated him not to discredit his own honour and the Romanes, whom he obeyed: and he lifting up his sword on high, that either part might see, slew himself. Yet one Artorius from amidst the fire escaped by this device: he called unto him one Lucius his fellow-souldier and chamber-fellow; I will (quoth he) make thee heire of all my inheritance, if thou wilt catch me in thy armes. Lucius willingly endeavouring to do it, Artorius cast himselfe downe upon him, and so escaped with his life, but Lucius upon whom he fell was bruised against the pavement, and so died. This calamity a while did greatly grieve the Romanes, yet it made them more wary afterward, and acquainted them with the Jews subtilties, whereof before being ignorant, they sustained great damage; so the porch was burnt unto the tower which John built, during his wars against Simon; and the Jews, after the Romanes that were ascended into it were consumed, pulled downe the rest. The next day the Romanes fired the North porch, even unto the foresaid East porch, which contained the corners of the wall builded over the valley Cedron, so that it was terrible to behold the valley from thence, by reason of the depth.

Longus killed himselfe.

Of the famine amongst the Jews.

Such were the affairs about the Temple, but an infinite multitude perished within the Citie through famine, so that they could not be numbred: for in every place where any shew or signe of food was, presently arose a battell, and the dearest friends of all now fought one with another, to take the food from other poore souls, neither did they beleieve them that were now a dying for famine, but the theeves searched them, whom they saw yeelding up the ghost, thinking that they dying for famine, had hid about them some food: but they were deceived of their hope, being like mad dogs, greedy of meat, and fell against the doores like drunken men, searching the self-same houses twice or thrice together in desperation, and for very penury they ate whatsoever they light upon, gathering such things to eat, as the most filthy living creatures in the world would have loathed. In brief, they did eat their girdles and shooes, and the skins that covered their shields, so that a little of old hay was sold for four Attiques. But what need is it to shew the sharpnesse of this famine by things that want life? I will recount an act never heard of, neither among the Greeks, nor any other barbarous people, horrible to be rehearsed, and incredible: so that I would willingly omit this calamity, lest posteritie should think I lie, had not I many witnesses hereof, and perhaps should incurre reprehension, nor fully recounting all accidents of them that are dead.

A Certain woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Jordan, the daughter of Elezar of the towne of Vitezokia, which signifieth the house of Hysop, descended of noble and rich parentage, flying with the rest unto Jerusalem, was there with them besieged, her other goods the tyrants had taken from her, which she had brought from beyond the river into the city: and whatsoever being hid, escaped their hands, the theeves daily came into her house and took it away: whereat the woman greatly moved, cursed them, and with hard speeches animated them the more against her, yet no man either for anger, or compassion would kill her, but suffered her to live to get them meat: but now could she get no more, and famine invaded her, with rage and anger more then danger. Wherefore by rage and necessity she was compelled to do that which nature abhorred, and taking her sonne unto whom she then gave suck, O miserable childe (quoth she) in warre, famine, and sedition, for which of these shall I keep thee? If thou continue among the Romanes, thou shalt be made a slave, yet famine will prevent bondage, or else sedition worse then them both. Be therefore meat for me, a terrour unto the seditious, a tragicall story to be spoken of by posterity, and that which is onely yet unheard of among the calamities of the Jews. Having thus spoken she slew her sonne, and did seeth the one halfe of him, and ate it, the rest she reserved covered. Presently came the seditious, smelling the sent of that execrable meat, threatening presently to kill her, except she forthwith brought some of that unto them which she had prepared. Then she answered that she had reserved a good portion thereof for them, and presently uncovered that part of her son which she had left uneaten, at which sight they trembled, and a horror fell upon them. But the woman said, This is truly my sonne, and my doing, eat you of it, for I my self have eaten thereof. Be not more effeminate then a woman, nor more mercifull then a mother. If religion make you refuse this my sacrifice, I have already eaten of it, and will eate the rest. Then the seditious departed hereat, onely trembling; and scarcely permitting this meat to the mother. Presently the report of this hainous crime was bruted all about the city, and every man having before his eyes this execrable fact, trembled as though himself had done it. And now all that were vexed with this famine, hastned their own deaths, and he was accounted happy that died before he felt this famine. This unnaturall fact was soon after recounted unto the Romanes, and some of them would not beleieve it, others pried them within the City, and many hereat encreased their hatred towards that nation.

Cesar before Almighty God protested, that he was not the cause of this, having offered the

A the Jews peace, free pardon and forgiveness for all their offences past, and that they did rather make choice of warre then peace, of sedition then quietnesse, of famine rather then wealth and plenty, having with their own hands begun to set on fire the Temple, which he had preserved for them, and that therefore such like meat was fit for them, and that he would bury this abominable crime of eating their own children in the ruins of their countrey, and that he would not in any part of the world suffer the Sunne to shine upon such a City, wherein mothers did eat their own children, and that such food did more befeem fathers then mothers, who for all their miseries would not yet cease from arms. Having thus spoken, he considered the desperation of the enemies, and that they would not recall themselves, who had already endured all such calamities, which might if it had been possible have altered their opinions, rather then have endured them.

HE eighth day of August, two of the Romane legions having finished their mounts, they began to place their Rammes against the East galleries without the Temple, having six dayes together without intermission, alreadie beaten the wall with their strongest Rammes, and nothing prevailed, the stones being so strong, that the Rammes could not move them: others of the Romanes laboured to dig up the foundations of the porch, that was on the North side; and after much toil, they onely could pull away the outward stones, and the inner stones did still support the porch. At last the Romanes seeing themselves not prevail by their javelins and other instruments, they set ladders to ascend into the galleries. The Jews did not greatly labour to hinder them from getting up: but when they were within the galleries, then they came and fought with them, and cast some of them down headlong, forcing them to retire, others they slew that stood in it; and others that were upon the ladders going down, before they could defend themselves with their shields, were with swords stricken down, and they also thrust down some ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great massacre of the Romanes, some fighting for their ensignes, which the Jews had taken from them, esteeming the losse thereof a great shame unto them. At last the Jews got their apcients, and slew them that came up to rescue them; and the rest terrified with their deaths that were slain, went down again, and no one of the Romanes died, who before he was slain did not some valiant act; and those seditious people that in the former battels did shew themselves valiant, did now also fight valiantly, and beside them Eleazar, sonne unto the Tyrant the brother of Simon. Then Titus perceiving that he spared the Temple of the Jews to his losse, and to the death of his souldiers, he commanded fire to be put to the Temple gates: presently Ananus of Emmaus the most cruell of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the sonne of Magedan, fled unto Titus, who, for their cruelties committed, determined to put them to death: yet they hoped for pardon, for that they had now forsaken the Jews when they had gotten the better hand. But Titus affirmed they came not of good will, but for necessity, and that they did not deserve to live forsaking their countrey now set on fire for their offences: yet his promise bridled his wrath, and he dismissed them, but they were not so much esteemed as the rest. The Romane souldiers did now put fire unto the Temple doores: and the silver plate wherewith they were covered being molten, the flame quickly fired the wood, and encreasing, took hold presently on the next porch. The Jews seeing themselves invironed with flames, were now altogether discouraged, and their strength failed them, and being amazed no man sought to extinguish the flame, and so they stood still beholding the fire, yet not lamenting that which was set on fire, more then desiring to save the rest: and so that day and all the next night the fire encreased, for the porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at once.

The Jews overcome the

would never live peaceably their Temple standing, all their Nation wheresoever living, assembling themselves thither at certain times. Others perswaded Titus, that if so be the Jews yeelded their Temple, and fought not for it, then to save it, but if they fought for it, to burne it: for now it seemed a castle and not a Temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it should not be imputed to the Romanes or to their Generall, but to the Jews who constrained them to do it; and he offended not, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed, that although the Jews fought for their Temple being men without conscience, yet it should not be destroyed: for he would not so be revenged of their iniquities: neither would he ever fire so goodly a building; for so it would redound to the losse of the Romanes; as also it would be a credit unto them, if it were left remaining. And now Alexander, Fronto, and Cerealis, perceiving Casars minde, were of his opinion, and so he dismissed the convocation, and commanded the souldiers and Captaines to rest, that they might be more able to fight when need required: and presently he appointed certaine chosen men to make the wayes even, and easie for the army to passe by the ruins, commanding them to quench the fire; and that day the Jews being fearfull and weary did make no resistance. The day following taking heart and assembled together, they assaulted the watchmen that kept without the Temple, the second hour of the day. The Romanes valiantly resisted their first assault, so defending themselves with their shields as though they had a wall before them; yet sure it was that they would not long abide, for that they were fewer in number then their enemies, and not so desperate as they were. Then Casars before his men retired (beholding the fight from Antonia) with certain chosen horsemen came to succour them: whose force the Jews not sustaining, but the first of them being slain, the rest fled: and the Romanes departing, they returned, and fought against them; and when the Romanes returned again, presently they fled, till about the fifth hour of the day, the Jews were forced to betake themselves into the Temple, and there they were shut up. Then Titus returned into Antonia, purposing the next day to assault them with all his army, and winne the Temple. But the sentence of God had already determined, that it should be consumed with fire: and now the satall day was come after many yeers, which was the tenth of August: upon which day also, the King of Babylon did once before fire it, yet was it now first set a fire by our own countrey-men, who were indeed the cause thereof. For the seditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then again they assaulted the Romanes, and so fought with the guard that were without the Temple, labouring to extinguish the flame; who putting the Jews to flight, came unto the Temple.

How the Temple was burnt against the will of TITUS.

Then a certain souldier, who expected no command, nor feared to do so execrable a fact, moved with some divine fury, and lifted up by his fellow, took in his hand a flaming fire-brand, and cast it into the golden gate which entred into the rooms on the North part of the Temple, and the flame presently arose: which caused a great cry amongst the Jews, expressing their calamity, and every one hastened to extinguish the fire; now neither accounting of their lives nor forces, having lost that for which they so fought. News hereof was presently brought unto Titus, by one who came from the fight, who then was resting in his tabernacle, and he presently arose and ran unto the Temple to hinder the fire, and all the Captains after him; whereat the souldiers being terrified followed, & there arose a great cry and tumult in that army being unordered. Casars both with voyce and hand made a signe unto the souldiers, that were fighting to quench the fire. But they did not heare him, there was so great a noyse, neither did they perceive the signe he had made unto them with his hand, because that some were distracted with fight, others with anger: and the souldiers issued in, not restrained either by commands or threatnings, but every one went whither fury carried him: and thronging together at the entrance, many pressed one another to death; and many being amongst the fiery ruins of the galleries, perished as miserably as those that were overcome. When they came unto the Temple, every one counterfeited himself not to heare Casars command, and so exhorted his fellows that were before him to fire the Temple. The seditious now had no hope to withstand them, but either fled or were slaine; and many unarmed and unable people, wheresoever they were found, were slaine: so that about the altar were an innumerable company

A pany of dead bodies heaped together, and their blood flowed downe the Temple staires, and their bodies that were slaine rouled downe, Casar seeing he could not restraine the fury of the mad-braine souldiers, and that the fire encreased entred into the Temple with his Nobles, and beheld all the holy things there, and whatsoever else was there, farre surpassing all report which strangers had given of it, and equall to the report which the Jews made of it. And the flame not having yet pierced into the inner part of the Temple, nor yet consumed the houses and roomes about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preserved: wherefore himself came and entreated the souldiers to extinguish the fire: commanding Liberalis the Centurion of his guard to beat those with a trunchion that would not be obedient, and drive them away. But their fury and the rage of warre, and the hatred they bare against the Jews, overcame in them all Casars commands, and fear of them that forbade them. Many were incited so to do, hoping of some bootie, thinking that all the Temple within was full of money, because they saw the gates of gold. Moreover, a certaine souldier, when Casar sought to quench the flame, fired the postes about the doors: and presently the flame appearing within, Casar and the Captains departed, and so every one stood looking upon it, and no man sought to extinguish it. Thus the Temple was burnt against Titus his will. And although every man will judge it a lamentable case, in such a building surpassing all that ever was seene or heard of, both in greatnesse, workmanship, costliness and plenty of all things, in this yet we may comfort our selves, in that the destinies had so determined. For neither living creatures, nor places, nor buildings can avoyd their destiny. One may also admire the exact and just revolution of time: for it was now destroyed in the same moneth, and on the same day that the Babylonians first destroyed it: and from that time that Salomon began the first Temple, unto the destruction of the second Temple, which hapned the second yeer of Vespasians reigne, were a thousand a hundreth and thirty yeeres, seven moneths, and fifteene daies; and from the building of the latter Temple which Aggeus built in the second yeer of the reigne of King Cyrus, unto the destruction thereof now in Vespasians reigne, were six hundreth thirty nine yeeres and five and fourtie dayes.

W H E N the Temple was thus consumed with fire, whatsoever the souldiers found therein, they carried away, and put all to the sword that were in it, which was an infinite number: neither did they shew any pity to old age, or infants: but old, young, Priests and common people, all were slaine without respect, and all sorts of people tasted the calamitie of warre, whether they resisted, or intreated for mercy. And now the flame encreased, which grieved even them that were yeelding up the ghost: and by reason of the height of the hill, and the building together, one would have thought the whole City had beene on fire. Then a most lamentable cry was raised betweene the Romane legions, and the seditious now invironed with fire and sword, and of the people that were taken in the higher part of the Citie, and had fled unto the Romanes, lamenting their calamitie; and they of the Citie answered the teares and cries of them in the hill, and many whose eyes death by famine had already closed, took strength awhile to bewaile the Temple, which they now opening their eyes beheld on fire. The countrey beyond Jordan, and the mountaines about did eccho with their laments: and yet the calamitie surpassed that tumult. The Romanes thought it in vaine to spare the buildings about the Temple, seeing the Temple was already consumed, and so set fire on them all, the porches, galleries and gates, two onely excepted, one on the East side, and the other on the South side, both which afterward they razed unto the ground: they burnt also certain chests called Gazophylacia, or money boxes, wherein was great store of coine, and rich garments, and other precious things, and indeed all the Jews treasure, for the richest of the Citie had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the porch that was left standing, many men, women, and children, to the number of six thousand. And before Caesar and the Captaines did determine any thing what should be done with them, the furious souldiers fired the porch wherein they were, and so they all perished in the flames, save a few, that leaping down to avoid the fire, were slaine in the fall, so that no one escaped of all that multitude. A certaine false prophet was cause of all their deaths, who the same day preached in the Citie, and commanded them to go into the Temple, and behold signes of their deliverance: for many false prophets were then suborned by the tyrants, to perswade them to expect Gods help, thereby to hinder them from flying to the Romanes, and to cause the souldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their Citie. Men easily beleeve and are credulous in adversity, so that if any deceitfull person promise deliverance out of calamity, he that suffereth misery, is full of hope thereof.

Hese miserable people were thus easily perswaded by impostors who did belie God, yet would they not beleeve, nor give any eare or regard unto certain tokens, and signes of the ruin of their city: but as it were blinded, neither having eyes nor souls, they counterfeited themselves not to see what God foreshewed them. One while there was a Comet in forme of a fiery sword, which for a yeer together did hang over the city: another time before the first revolt and warre, the people being gathered together to the feast of unleavened bread (which was the 8. day of April) the ninth houre of the night there was so much light about the Altar and Temple, as though it had been bright day, which remained halfe an houre: this the ignorant people interpreted as a good signe; but they that were skilfull in holy Scripture, did presently judge, what would ensue before it came to passe. At the same festivity, a Cow led to be sacrificed at the Altar, brought forth a lambe in the midst of the Temple: and the Inner gate of the Temple on the East side being of massive brasse, which at night time had alwaies at least twentie men to shut it, and was bound with locks of iron, and was barred with barres, the ends whereof went into mortise holes in the stones on either side the doore (the foresaid stones being on each side one whole stone) was seene at the first houre of the night to open of his own accord: which being presently related unto the Magistrate by the keepers of the Temple he himself came thither and could scarcely shut it, and this also to the ignorant seemed a good signe, affirming that God opened unto them the gate of his blessings; but the wiser sort judged that the defence of the Temple would decay of his own accord, and that the opening of the gate foretold, that it should be given to the enemies, affirming one unto another that this signe signified desolation. A little while after the feast daies, on the 21. day of May there was seene a vision beyond all beliefe, and perhaps that which I am to recount might seeme a fable, if some were not now alive that beheld it, and that calamity worthy to be so foretold ensued: for before the sunne set, were seene in the ayre iron Chariots, all over the countrey, and an army in battell aray passing along in the clouds, and begirting the Citie. And upon the feast day called Pentecost, at night the Priests going into the inner Temple to offer their wonted sacrifice, at first felt the place to move and tremble, and afterward they heard a voice which said, Let us depart hence. And that which was most wonderfull of all, one Iesus the sonne of Ananus a countrey man of the common people, foure yeeres before the warres began, when the Citie flourished in peace and riches, coming to the celebration of the feast to Jerusalem, which we call the feast of Tabernacles, suddenly began to cry out thus; A voyce from the East: A voyce from the West: A voyce from the four windes: A voyce against Jerusalem and the Temple: A voyce against men and women newly married: A voyce against all this people: and thus crying night and day, he went about all the streets of the city.

A Some of the Nobility disdaining misfortune, took him and scourged him with many stripes: but he, neither secretly speaking for himself, nor to those that did beat him, persevered crying as before. The Magistrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man spake this through some divine motion, led him unto the Generall of the Romanes; where being beaten till his bones appeared, he never intreated nor wept, but as well as he could, framing a weeping voyce he cried, Wo, wo unto Jerusalem. Albinus (being then Judge) asked him what he was, or of whence, or wherefore he said so, but he made him no answer. Yet he ceased not to bewaile the misery of Jerusalem, untill Albinus thinking him to be out of his wits, suffered him to depart. This man even untill the time of war never went to any Citizen, nor was seen speak to any one: but still as it were studying of some speech, he cried, Wo, wo unto Jerusalem. Neither did he ever curse any one, though every day one or other did beate him; nor thank any one that offered him meat. All that he spake unto any man was this hea-
B vie prophecy. He went crying as is aforesaid, chiefly upon holy dayes, so doing continually for the space of seven yeers and five moneths, his voyce never waxed hoarse nor weary, till in the time of the siege, beholding what he foretold them, he ceased, and then once again upon the wals going about the city, with a loud voyce he cried, Wo, wo to the City, Temple and people: and lastly he said, Wo also to my self. Which words were no sooner uttered, but a stone shot out of an engine smote him, and so he yeelded up the ghost, lamenting them all.

The year of the world, 4014, after Christ's nativity, 73.

Jesus for seven years space and five moneths cried about the Citie. A stone shot from an engine killed Jesus.

If any one do diligently consider all these, he shall finde that God hath a care of mankind, and doth every way foreflew betime, what is most expedient for them, and they through their own madnesse, to have voluntarily perished in their wickednesse. For the Jews, when the Castle Antonia was taken, made the Temple foure-square: notwithstanding that it was written in the holy Scripture, that the City and Temple should be taken, when the Temple was made foure-square. But that which chiefly incited them to warre, was the doubtfull prophecy likewise found in the holy Scriptures: That at the same time one in their dominions should be Monarch of the whole world; and many wisemen were deceived in this interpretation, making account that he should be one of their own nation, yet indeed thereby was foretold Vespasians Empire. But men cannot prevent destiny, though they foresee it. Thus the Jews interpreted some of the signes as they pleased, and at others they laughed, till by the ruine of their countrey, and their own wofull overthrow, their iniquitie appeared.

The Jews interpreting the signes to their own good liking, are their Countreys ruine, and the cause of their own calamity.

CHAP. XIII.

How TITUS was made Emperour: and of the death of the Priests.

After the seditious were fled into the Citie, all the Temple and places thereabout being set on fire, the Romanes placing their Ensignes in the Temple over against the East gate: and there celebrating sacrifice, with great cries declared Titus Emperour, and the Romanes got many preyes and booties, that they sold gold in Syria for half the vaw. And among those Priests that kept on the wall, E a child being thirsty, desired peace of the Romane watchmen, saying, that he was thirsty. So they, pitying both his yeers and his need, gave him their hands that he should have no harme, and then he came down and drunk, and filled a bottle which he brought with him: and when he had done, he ranne up again to his fellows, and none of the watchmen were able to overtake him, and they upbraided him with falshood. But he answered, that he had done nothing, but that which he and they intended: for they did not give him their hands to secure him to remain with them, but onely to come down and take water, which he had done. The Romane watchmen greatly admired the subtilty of him that was but a childe. The fifth day, the Priests being almost famished came down, and the watchmen carried them to Titus, whom they besought to grant them their lives. But he answered them, that the time of pardon was past, seeing that was destroyed, for the which he might have pardoned them, and that it was meete that the Priests should perish with the Temple: and so he commanded them to be put to death. Then the Tyrants with their followers being on every side beset with warres, and having no way to flee, they being thus beleagred round, requested to parley with Titus; who for his naturall meeknesse, his friends also perswading him thereto, thought at least to save the Citie (judging indeed that now the seditious had already their mindes) and so he stood in the West part of the inner Temple: for there was a gate built above a gallery, and a bridge that joyned the Temple and Citie together, which was then between Titus and the tyrants. Many souldiers on both parts flocked about their Rulers; the

to the Jews by an Interpreter.

The Romanes
humanity incited the Jews
against them.

Jews about Simon and Iohn, hoping for pardon: the Romanes about Titus, desirous what he would say unto them: and Titus by an Edict commanding the souldiers to be quiet, and to shoot no arrows, spake unto them first by an Interpreter, thereby shewing that he had the upper hand, and said, O ye men of Jerusalem, are ye not now glutted with the calamities of your countrey? Neither calling to minde our power, nor your own infirmity, but with a rash fury have destroyed your people, City and Temple: your selves also having justly deserved to perish, who, since Pompey first conquered you, have never ceased to be seditious, and at last, have openly borne arms against the Romanes. Did you trust unto your multitude? You have seen that a small parcell of the Romanes army hath sufficiently resisted you. Or did you expect forraign aide? What nation is not under our dominion? and who would rather make choyce of the Jews then of the Romanes? Did you trust in your strength of body? why, you know the Germanes serve us. Or in the strength of your wals? what wall, or what greater hindrance then the Ocean, wherewith the Britaines invironed, have yeelded unto the Romane forces? Or to your courage, and politike counsell of your Captains? You have already heard that the Carthagenians have been by us surprized: It was therefore the Romans humanity that incited you against themselves, who first of all permitted you to possesse your countrey, and gave you Kings of your own nation: and after all this, we kept your laws inviolate, and suffered you to live as your selves desired, not onely in your own countrey, but also amongst other nations; and which is the greatest of all our benefits bestowed upon you, we permitted you to gather tribute and gifts to the maintenance of your Temple and sacrifices to God; of all which, we neither forbade any to be brought unto you, neither hindred any that would offer unto your Temple, but suffered you our enemies to be made richer then our selves, so that you have used our own money against us. Wherefore, having received so many benefits at our hands, you have now disgorged your selves upon us, and like spitefull serpents, spet your poyson upon them that made much of you. Let us omit that by Nero his negligence you became forgetfull of your duty, and like some member in the body broken or shrunk, you being still tumultuous, at last were taken in a greater offence, and were encouraged with immoderate desires to hope for unlawfull libertie. My father came into your countrey, not to punish you for your misdemeanour toward Cestius, but by good counsell and warning to reprehend and quiet you. And whereas if he had come to destroy your nation, he ought first to have cut down the very root, and to have come unto this city and destroyed it, with the inhabitants: he rather chose first to waste Galileá, and the places adjoyning, that in the mean time you might repent you, and consider of your estate. But this his mercy towards you was held for cowardlineffe and infirmity in him, and by our long suffering, you were emboldned against us: and when Nero was dead, you did as treacherous subjects are wont to do, taking occasion by our civill dissention, to revolt from us: and whilest my father and I were gone into Egypt, you prepared your selves to warre against us: neither were you ashamed to trouble them that were designed Princes, whom notwithstanding you had found most gentle Captains unto you. At last, when the Empire fell unto us, and all things being now quieted, all nations with gifts and presents came to congratulate us: behold again, the Jews shewed themselves our enemies, and you sent an Embassador beyond Euphrates, onely to nourish your rebellion, walling and fortifying your towns anew: and contending like seditious and tyrants one with another, set abroad civill warres: all which, none but impious people would have committed. Wherefore being commanded by my father, who was now urged thereunto, I came against this city with a heavy charge, yet did I rejoyce when I heard that the people desired peace. Before I warred against you, I exhorted you to peace: after war was begun, I desisted a while from using severitie: I spared all them that of their own accord fled unto me, and kept my promise unto them, pitying those that were captives. I with strokes restrained them that halted the warre against you against my will; and even forced so to do, I set the Romanes against your wals, and alwaies restrained my souldiers so much desirous of your blood. As often as I overcame you, so often did I exhort you to peace, as though I had been vanquished. Again, when I approached unto the Temple, I (willingly omitting the law of arms) requested you to spare both it and the holy things, offering you leave to depart, and promising you safety, or licencing you to fight another time in another place, if so you thought good. All these my offers you refused, and with your own hands fired your Temple. And now you wicked wretches urge me to a parlee. What thing can you now preserve so excellent, as that which is already perished? What pardon can you expect, seeing your Temple is destroyed? nay, even now you stand armed, not so much as counterfeiting submission in the last cast. O wretches, with what hope?

A hope? Is not your people dead, is not your Temple destroyed, and your city now in my hands, yea, your lives also? But do you think death the renown of fortitude? I will not strive with your obstinacy: yet if you will cast down your weapons, and yeeld your bodies, I will spare your lives: And like as in a private house I will shew my selfe unto you a gentle master, and after I have punished that which otherwise is incurable, I will reserve the rest for my selfe.

Titus grants the Jewes life, on condition they should lay aside their weapons, and submit themselves.

To this they answered, that they could not receive pardon at his hands, having vowed the contrary: wherefore they requested licence to depart with their wives and children by the camp, which he had environed with a wall, and so to go into the wilderness, and leave the Citie to the Romanes. Titus was hereat greatly enraged, that they being in a manner captives, should impose upon him conditions, as though they were victors; and commanded a crier to tell them, that henceforth they should not flee unto him, nor hope that he would pardon them: for he would spare nothing, willing them with all their forces to fight and save themselves as they could; for he would now in all things use the law of arms: and so he permitted the souldiers to sack the Citie and set it on fire. And that day they did nothing: but the next day following, they fired the conncell-house, the palace Acra, and Ophla, and the fire came unto Queen Helens palace, which was situate in the midst of Acra: also the houses and streets of the Citie full of dead bodies were set on fire. The same day, the sonnes and brethren of King Izates, and with them many nobles of the people, assembled together, besought Cesar to pardon them: and he though incensed against them all, yet not changing his maner, received them to mercy, and put them all in prison, and afterward carried them bound to Rome for hostages, that were the Kings sons and kinsmen.

The souldiers set the city on fire.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the prey of the seditious, and the burning of the inner part of the Citie.

D T He seditious went unto the Kings Palace, where many had left all their wealth, because it was a strong place: and driving the Romanes from thence, they slew all the people there assembled, amounting to the number of 3000, and 400. and carried away all the money, and they took there two Romane souldiers alive, one a horseman, and another a footman; and they slew the footman, and drew him all along the Citie, as it were in the body of that one, revenging themselves upon all the Romanes. But the horseman affirmed that he had something to say unto them, which would greatly profit them, and save their lives: who was carried to Simon; and not having there any thing to say, Simon delivered him to one of his Captains called Ardala to be slain, and he brought him where the Romanes might behold him with his hands bound behinde him, and a veile before his eyes, meaning there to behead him: but he, whilest the Jew drew out his sword, fled to the Romanes. And Titus would not put him to death, because he had escaped from the enemies: yet deeming him unworthy to be a Romane souldier, who suffered himselfe to be taken alive, he took from him his arms, and discharged him from bearing them any more, which to a wise man was worse then death. The next day, the Romanes putting the seditious to flight that were in the lower Citie, they fired all unto Siloa, rejoicing that the town was destroyed: yet they got no booties, because the seditious had already robbed and spoiled all, and carried it into the higher City. For they nothing repented them of their wickednesse, but were as arrogant as though they had been in prosperitie: so that they with joy beheld the City on fire, affirming that they desired death; for that the people being slain, the Temple destroyed, and the Citie on fire, they should leave nothing to their enemies. Yet Ioseph in that extremity laboured to save the reliques of the Citie, much inveighing against their crueltie, and earnestly exhorting them to save themselves: yet he nothing profited in all this, but was derided for his labour: for neither would they yeeld to the Romanes for their oaths sake, neither were they able to fight with the Romanes, being now as it were besieged round by them; yet their accustomed murders did encourage them to stand out.

The punishment of a Romane souldier taken by the Jewes.

The Jewes are arrogant in midst of their calamitie.

The Jewes refuse to submit themselves to the Romanes, yet are they unable to wage warre with them.

Thus dispersed all over the City, they lurked in the ruines, lying in waite for those that sought to flee unto the Romanes, and many of them were taken, and all of them were slain; for famine had so weakned them, that they could not flee, and they cast their dead bodies to dogs. And any death were easie in respect of famine. So that many fled unto the Romanes, manes, having no promise, no nor hope to be pardoned by them, and upon purpose fell into the hands of the seditious, who never ceased from murder: and now there was no place in the whole Citie void, but was filld with dead bodies, who either perished by famine or sedition. But the tyrants and factious theeves put their last refuge in the vaults, where they hoped whatsoever hapned to save themselves, hoping that there they could not be found, and so after the Citie was destroyed, to escape, which was onely their vain fantasie. For they could neither be hid from God nor the Romanes: yet at that time they trusted in those caves, from whence they fired the Citie more then the Romanes, and cruelly murdered them, that having escaped the flames, came and fled into secret places, and spoiled them: also if they in any place found any meat, though all bloody, yet they took it, and did eat it, and now one of them began to fight with another about the spoile they got. And I verily perswade my self, that had they not been prevented by the destruction of the Citie, their cruelty would have been such, that they would have eaten the bodies of dead men.

CHAP. XV.

How the higher part of the Citie was assaulted: and how some of the Iews fled unto TITUS.

CESAR, perceiving that the higher part of the Citie would not be won without mounts, being situate in a soile, round about the which were high and deep places, on the twentieth day of August, he set all his souldiers on work, and the carrying of wood for that purpose was very painfull: all trees within 100. furlongs off the Citie were already cut down, and used in the former work, as is before said. So the foure legions raised a mount on the West side of the Citie, and all the rest made a mount against the porch, bridge and tower, which Simon during his warres with Iohn had built. About this time, the Captains of the Idumæans assembling together, deliberated to yeeld themselves, and sent five of their company to Titus, beseeching him to confirme a peace unto them: and he hoping that the tyrant would yeeld after them, who were the greatest part of his army, with much ado granted them life, and so sent them to their fellows: but Simon had notice of their departure, and presently slew those five that were sent unto Titus, and taking the Captains (the noblest of whom was James, the son of Sofa) he put them in prison, and also kept and guarded the Idumæans, who now having no Governours knew not what to do, yet the guard could not hinder them from fleeing: for although many of them were kild, yet divers fled and escaped, and were all received by the Romanes; Titus courtesie being such, as that he remembered not his former Edict to the contrary, and now the souldiers hoping for gaine, and having already gotten sufficient, abstained from murders: for leaving onely the common people, they sold the rest with their wives and children for a small price, many being exposed to sale, and few coming to buy them: so that he having made an Edict that none should flee unto him alone, intending thereby to bring their families with them, yet he now received them also, appointing some to enquire who had deserved punishment, and to inflict it on them. And an infinite number was sold, and more then 40000. of the people were saved, whom the Emperour dismissed, and permitted to go whither they pleased. The same time a certain Priest, the sonne of Thebathus, named Iesus, was promised pardon, on condition he should deliver certain holy things given to the Temple: and so he came and brought out of a wall two candlesticks, like to them that were in the Temple, tables, goblets, cups, all made of solid and massive gold: also the veile and the ornaments of the Priests, and the precious stones about them, and many vessels made for sacrifice. Moreover, the Keeper of the holy Treasure called Phineas, brought forth the garments, and all things that did belong to the Priests, and much purple and scarlet, which were laid up in store, to make tapestry or hangings, among which also was some Cinnamon, Cassia, and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded sweet odours to be offered to God. He also delivered him much wealth of other mens, and much Sacred Treasure: for the which, notwithstanding he was taken by force, yet he was pardoned, as they were that fled unto Cesar.

*How the rest of the Citie was taken.The year of the

He seventh day of September, the mounts being finished, which was the 18. day after they were begun, some of the Romanes placed their Rams and Engines to batter them, and some of the seditions, who now despaired to keep the Citie, left the wals, and fled into Acra, others hid themselves in certain vaults, and many hindred the Romanes, and resisted them for placing their Rams against the wals, who were overcome by them, being both more in number then they were, and also stronger and more valiant. The Jews being now all discouraged and sorrowfull; so soon as any part of the wall was broken down, or shaken with the force of the Rams, straightwaies fled, and now the tyrants were surprized with a greater feare then needed. For even before such time as the enemies had entred the wall, they stood in doubt whether they might flee or no: and they who a little before were proud and arrogant malefactors, did now tremble & quake, so that it was pitifull to see such a change in them, though they were wicked persons. And they endeavoured to assaile the wall that Titus had built to copasse the whole city withall: but seeing themselves forsaken of all those that were wont to be trusty unto them, every one fled whither necessitie did drive him. Presently news were brought them that all the West wall of the City was beaten down, others affirmed that the Romanes had entred, and that they had seen the enemies in the towers, fear dazeling their eyes: and prostrate on the ground, they bewailed their misfortune; and as though they had been lame, they stood still, and sought not to flee. From whence one may chiefly perceive Gods justice toward the impious, and the Romanes fortune: for the tyrants deprived themselves of their strong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their towers, wherein they could never have been taken but by famine: and the Romanes, having so much laboured at the lower wals, did now by fortune take these, which their engines could never have shaken, for there were three inexpugnable towers that could not be battered with the engines, whereof before we have made mention. So the tyrants having forsaken these, or rather being by Gods will driven from hence, presently they fled unto the valley Siloa; after the fear was past, they again took heart, and went unto the wall that was in that place: yet not using such courage and violence as their need required, they were beaten by the watchmen that guarded it; their strength now failing and wearied with labour, fear, famine and calamity. And some were driven one way, and some another, and were forced to hide themselves in vaults and sinks. The Romanes having obtained the wall, placed their colours in the towers, and clapping their hands, and singing for joy, they cried, Victory, finding the end of the warre nothing so terrible as the beginning. Yet did they not beleieve that was the end, because they got the wall without any bloodshed, but admired, seeing no man did offer to resist them. And now issuing into every street, they slew whomsoever they found, without any respect, and fired houses, and all the people that had fled into them, and destroyed many whereas they entred for to get a prey, and they found whole families dead, and houses full of dead bodies, consumed by famine. Thus terrified with that heavy sight, they departed out, not taking any thing away, yet for all that they pitied not them that were left alive, but slew whomsoever they met, whereby they filled the narrow streets so full of dead bodies by them slain, that none could passe that way for them: all the whole citie flowed with blood, so that many things set on fire, were quenched with the blood of them that were slain. At evening they ceased from killing, but all the night long the fire encreased: and so in the morning, which was the 8. day of September, all was now on fire, the City in the time of the siege having endured more misery and calamity, then ever it received joy and happiness from the time of the first foundation, notwithstanding that they were so great, that all citie's might justly envy it, and it no wise deserved so to be oppressed with such misery, save onely for that it fostered and bred such impious persons as wrought the overthrow thereof.

Titus, entring in to the City, amongst the rest admired the strong holds thereof, and the rocky towers which the tyrants like mad men deprived themselves of: and seeing the height, firmnesse, bignesse, and the joyning of the stones together, and their breadth and height, he said: Surely, God hath assisted us in the fight, and he it was that did withdraw the Jews from these fortresses. For what could mens hands and engines prevaile against them? And having spoke much to this effect, coming with his friends, he set them at libertie whom whom the tyrants had left bound in the Castles : and when he destroyed the rest of the Citie G and wals, he left those towers standing as a monument of his good fortune and victory, by the which he had gained them, though unexpugnable. The souldiers now being weary with killing the miserable Jews, & yet a great multitude remaining alive, Caesar commanded that onely the armed Jews and they that resisted should be slain, and the rest left alive. But the souldiers also killed old folks and weak persons, and taking all able men and lusty, they carried them into the Temple, and shut them there in the place appointed for the women. Caesar left one Fronto, a Libertine and his friend, to keep them, giving him also charge to make inquiry, who had deserved punishment, who slew all the theeves and seditious, one of them bewraying another, and reserved certain chosen young men of large stature and beautifull withall for the triumph : and all the rest that were above seventeen yeers old, he sent bound H into Egypt, to be employed in certain works there, as digging, delving and manuring the fields, & to be used in other publike busines. Titus also sent many of them unto divers Provinces to be slain in the Theaters with beasts or swords : and they that were under seventeen yeers of age were sold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, 10000. died for hunger, partly, for that their keepers hating them, would not give them any meat ; partly, for that some refused meat when it was offered them. For there was now scarcity of corn, by reason of the great multitude of the people.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the number of the captives, and them that were slain.

He number of all the captives that were taken during the whole time of warre, was 97000. and the number of all that died and were slain during the siege, was 1100000. the most of them being Jews by nation, but not inhabitants of that place. For being assembled together from all parts to the feast of unleavened bread, presently and on a sudden they were invironed with warre, and first of all a plague fell among them by reason of the straightnesse of the place, and immediately after, famine, worse then it. And that the Citie was capable of so many men it is evident, for that Cestius before numbred them ; who, desirous to signifie the flourishing estate and strength of Jerusalem unto Nero, who contemned our nation, requested the high Priests, that if possibly they could, they should number all the people in their Citie : and that upon the feast of Easter, when they killed offerings from the ninth houre of the day untill the eleventh (and to eate a Lambe not fewer then ten persons were assembled, for it is not lawfull to feast alone, yea, many times twenty are in a company) they numbred 256000. and 500. oblations or lambes to be killed ; so that if we reckon to every lambe ten men, the number amounts to 2700000. men, all purified, whole and sound : for it was not lawfull for any that were lepers, or had a flux of seed, nor women that had the monethly termes, to eate of that sacrifice, nor for any stranger, except he came thither for Religion sake. And this multitude was assembled together from other places, and was there by the providence of God shut up as it were in a prison. And the Citie being filled with men of warre was besieged, that the number of them that were slain, passed all that ever perished, either by any plague sent from God, or by the means of men ; who were partly openly slain, partly taken by the Romanes : who searching the vaults, and opening the sepulchres, spared none they met withall. There also were found more then 2000. whereof some slew themselves with their own hands, other some kild by others, the rest perished by famine. The stink of dead bodies was so great, that many minding to go and search the foresaid places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire : yet others for lucre sake treading on the dead carcases, searched the dead bodies, if they could finde any thing : for much riches were hid in the vaults, and covetousnesse omitted no way to gain. Moreover, many were taken out from thence, whom the tyrants had bound, who even in their extremitie ceased not to tyrannize : yet God plagued them both according to their deserts : for Iohn being now almost famished with his brethren in a vault, besought the Romanes to save his life. And Simon, having long striven with necessitie, as we shall hereafter make mention of, at last yeelded himselfe, who was kept for the triumph ; and Iohn was condemned to perpetuall prison. Then they destroyed the wals, and fired the outward parts of the Citie.

Hus was Ierusalem taken the second yeer of Vespasians reign, on the eighth day of September, and having been already five times before surprized, it was finally again destroyed. First Asochens King of Egypt, and after him Antiochus, then Pompey, and after them Herod with Sosius took the Citie, and yet destroyed it not. But before them the King of Babylon destroyed it, when he had injoyed the same, a thousand three hundredth and threescore yeers, eight moneths and six dayes after it was first built: but he that first built it, was one of the Princes of the Cananeans, in his own language called the just King. For he indeed was so, and therefore was the first Priest that sacrificed unto God, and dedicated a Temple, called the City Solyma: but David the King of the Jews having driven out the Cananeans, gave it unto his people to be inhabited, and after foure hundredth threescore foure yeers and three moneths, it was destroyed by the Babylonians: and from King David who was the first Jew that reigned there, untill the time that Titus destroyed it, were a thousand one hundred seventy and nine yeers, and from the time that it was first erected untill it was by him destroyed, were two thousand one hundred and seventie seven yeers: yet neither the antiquity, nor riches, nor the fame thereof now spread all over the world, nor the glory of Religion did any thing profit or hinder it, from being destroyed. Such was the end of the besieging of Ierusalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the souldiers to get, and that now there was nothing, against which the souldiers could shew their outrage (for they would have spared nothing that they could have spoiled) Cesar commanded them to destroy the citie and temple, onely yet leaving standing certain towers, that were more beautifull and stronger then the rest, to wit, Phasaelus, Hippicos, and Mariamme, and the wall that was on the West side, meaning there to keep a garrison, and that they should be monuments of the Romanes vertue, who had surprized a Citie so well fortified as it appeared by them. All the rest of the Citie they so plained, that they who had not seen it before, would not beleewe that it had ever been inhabited. This was the end of their madnesse, who were alwaies given unto sedition in Ierusalem, a most worthy City and famous amongst all nations.

CHAP. XIX.

CESAR determined to leave the tenth legion for a garrison in Ierusalem, with some troupes of horsemen and other companies of footmen: and all warres being now ended, hee purposed to thanke the whole armie for their valiant acts, and reward the most couragious for their deserts. And placing a greate tribunall in the midst before the campe, standing in it with the chiefe Peeres about him, from whence the whole armie might heare him, he gave them heartie thanks for that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during those warres, praising them for their loyaltie during all the foresaid time, and that in many skirmishes they had shewed themselves valiant, and by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their countrey: likewise they had now given all nations to understand, that neither the multitude of enemies, nor strong holds, nor greatnesse of Cities, nor rashnesse, nor barbarous cruelty of their adversaries could ever resist the forces of the Romanes, nor escape their hands; notwithstanding that in many things fortune favoured them: adding that it was a credit for them to have ended those warres that had continued a long time; which was all that they hoped for at their coming; and which was most glory of all unto them, that those Captains whom they had elected to be the Romane Emperours, were all liked and imbraced of all men, all standing to their appointment, and acknowledging themselves beholding to them that elected them. Moreover, that he admired them and loved them all, for that every one shewed himselfe valiant and couragious: affirming that he would now recompense those with honours, and due desert, who had behaved themselves most valiantly, and most hazarded themselves, and effected worthy deeds, and whosoever was forwarder then the rest, should have reward according to his desert. And that he would be more diligent in honouring them that had one by his name, and praised them, as greatly rejoycing at the valour of his countrey men, crowning them with crowns of gold, and put chains of gold about their necks, and gave them large spears of gold, and ensignes made of silver; he also preferred every one of them, and gave them of the spoil, precious garments, with gold and silver very plentifully: and under Cestius his government they fled from the Jews, being before at Raphanaas, which he sent unto Malto that is situate by Euphrates, in the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia, and the other two he kept with himselfe, as sufficient to guard him into Egypt, which were the fift and fiftenth legions. And coming to Caesarea by the Sea coast, he there laid up all his spoiles, and caused the captives to be kept, because that the Winter season permitted him not to sayle into Italy.

Hilest Titus was busied in the siege of Jerusalem, Vespasian in a Marchants Ship sayled to Rhodes: and from thence departing in a Gally, having visited all Cities by the which he passed, being joyfully received of them all, he went from Ionia into Greece, from thence unto Corcyra, and then unto Japygia, and afterwards K by Land. Thus Titus being returned from Caesarea on the Sea coast, he came unto Caesarea Philippi, and there he made a long abode, proclaiming all sorts of pastime: wherein many captives perished, some being cast unto wild beasts, others forced in great companies to fight one against another; being in this place, he understood that Simon the sonne of Giora was taken. This Simon at such time as Jerusalem was besieged, was in the higher part of the citie, when the Romane army had entered the wals, and began to waste it: and with his most trusty fellows, and certain Masons, having provided them all necessary tooles, and victuals that might have sufficed them all for many dayes, he accompanied with them, and went into a secret cave, unto the end thereof, and there he caused them to digge further, hoping so to get out at some place where he might safely escape away. Yet this his hope had not so good successe as he expected: for they had but digged a little way, ere victuals failed L them: notwithstanding, that they had made very great spare thereof. Then Simon thinking to feare the Romanes, clothed himselfe in white, and a purple cloake buttoned about him, and so came out of the earth in that place where the Temple had been builded before-time. And they that did first see him, were astonished awhile, and stirred not, but let him alone: yet at last they came unto him, and demanded what he was, but Simon would not tell them, willing them to call their Captain unto him, and presently some of the souldiers ran to call him, and so he came: at that time Terentius Rufus was Captain of the souldiers. Terentius having learned the truth of all, kept him bound, and related unto Caesar the maner of his taking, and thus Simon was by the power of God delivered into his enemies hands, who hared him above measure, and so was justly hereby punished, for having so cruelly tyranni- M zed over his own countrey men, not taken by their force, but yeelding himselfe unto them, having cruelly butchered many, under pretence of false criminations: to wit, for having revolted unto the Romanes.

But impiety cannot escape Gods vengeance, neither is the divine justice of so weak force, but that it can at one time or other punish them that violate it, and it many times inflicteth a grievous punishment upon men, when they think they have escaped all, for they were not presently punished; which also Simon felt, after he fell into the Romanes hands: his coming out of the earth, made a great many more of the seditious at that time to be taken in the caves. When Caesar was returned into Caesarea by the Sea coast, Simon was presented bound unto

A unto him, who commanded him to be reserved for his triumph, which he purposed to make at Rome. After making some abode in that place, he celebrated his brothers birth day with great solemnitie: and in that solemnitie bringing forth divers Jews, whose punishment he had of purpose deferred till that time, the number of all that perished there with fighting against beasts and amongst themselves, and by fire, amounted to more then 2000. and five hundred men. Yet the Romanes thought all these punishments too light and easie for them. After this, Cesar came to Berytus (which is a Citie in Phoenicia, and a Colony of the Romanes) and here also he made some long abode, and celebrated the birth of his father, with farre greater solemnitie then the former, as well in making divers shews unto the people, as in great expences and sumptuousnesse, and causing many captives to perish as before.

CHAP. XXI.

AT the same time the rest of the Jews were in great misery, and the City of Antiochia was incited against them, both for certain criminall causes now laid unto their charge, as also for certain offences before committed, which necessarily I must recount, before I speak any thing of the rest. The nation of the Jews is mixed almost amongst all nations of the world, and especially amongst the Syrians, by reason of their vicinitie, and many of them were at Antiochia, because it was a great Citie, and the Kings that succeeded Antiochus, permitted them freely to inhabit there, and to enjoy all liberties of the Citie. For Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, destroyed Jerusalem, and sacked the Temple: but the Kings successors restored all the brasse that was taken from the Temple unto the Jews, offering it unto their Synagogue in Antiochia, and permitted them to have the same liberties in the Citie, that the Greeks enjoyed, and the other Kings also of later times used them after the like sort: so that their number greatly increased, and they enlarged their Temple and enriched it with sundry offerings, oftentimes winning many Pagans to be of their religion, and so as it were made them also a part of their nation. Now about the time that the wars began, and Vespasian was newly arrived, the Jews began to be generally hated of all men: then one of them named Antiochus, reverend for parentage, whose father was chief of all the Jews in Antiochia, at such time as the people of Antiochia were assembled in the Theater, this man came in amongst them, and accused his own father, and the rest of the Jews to have conspired together to burn the Citie in the night time, and delivered some Jews unto them that were his guests, as conspirators with the rest. The people hearing this, could not repress their rage, but presently caused them that were offered unto them, to be burnt in the Theater, and made great speed to set upon all the Jews, hoping that by speedy dispatch they might preserve their countrey, which otherwise was like to perish. And then Antiochus to enrage them the more, did now offer to sacrifice according to the custome of the Pagans, thereby as it were assuring the Antiochians, that he hated the Jews and their customes, willing them also to compell all the rest of the Jews to do the like, for whosoever refused so to do were traitors. The Antiochians followed his counsell: but few Jews would obey them, yet they that denied to sacrifice were slain. Then Antiochus receiving a charge of souldiers from the Captain of the Romanes, became most cruell against his countrey men, and would not permit them to keep holy the seventh day; but in it to do all labour and businesse, that they were accustomed to do upon any other day, and so urged them hereto, that within short time the seventh day was not onely violated among them of Antiochia, but also in other places and Cities round about. The Jews at Antiochia having then endured the foresaid misery, now fell into as great calamitie as that was, whereof I intending to speak, was forced to relate the former. For it happened that the fouresquare market was fired, and the publike places, where all Writings and Registers were kept, as also the Kings Houses: and the fire so increased, that with much ado it was hindred from firing the whole Citie. Of this fact Antiochus accused the Jews, thereby sufficiently inciting the Antiochians against them, although that they had not before borne them any malice, and making them so easly beleieve his calumnies, who now gave full credit unto his accusations, by reason of that which was past: so that now they almost perswaded themselves, that they did see the Jews put fire unto them, and so in a great rage all of them set upon them that were accused. Wherefore Collega the younger had much ado to pacifie the people, notwithstanding that he requested them to permit him to informe

Then Collega making diligent enquiry of the matter, found out the truth, and not one of the Jews accused by Antiochus was guiltie: for certain impious people had done all this mischief, being indebted; thinking that if they had burnt the market-place, and the publike writings, that then their debts could not be requirred at their hands. Yet the Jews lived in great fear, and expected the event of those forged accusations.

After that Titus had received letters from his father, that he was arrived in Italy, and all Cities wherein he as yet came, welcomed him very joyfully, and that especially Rome had entertained him with great pompe and triumph, he was now eased of the care he had before, and very joyfull for his fathers welfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy did reverence Vespasian, though absent, as though he had been present with them, desiring to see his expected arrivall, whose coming they so heartily wished for. For the Senate, remembering what calamities had befallen the Citie in the change of Princes, desired to receive their Emperour dignified with the honour of old age, and martiall renown, whose presence onely would be to his subjects profit and safetie. And the vulgar sort also troubled before with civill warres, long expected his arrivall, assuring themselves thereby to have an end of their calamitie, and to recover again their wonted affluence. Especially he was expected by the souldiers, who knowing his skill in martiall affairs by that which himselfe had already done, and finding their other Captains, under whom they warred, ignorant and unskilfull, they wished for his coming, thereby to be delivered from the disgrace wherein they lived, desiring to receive him by whom they might both be honoured, and preserved from danger. The Nobilitie seeing him so beloved of all men, could no longer waite his coming, but went and met him, he being far from the Citie, and accompanied him; and no man stayed his coming, but in whole multitudes they went to meet him, they were so desirous to see him: so that more went to meet him then stayed at home.

When news was brought that he approached neer unto the Citie, and how friendly and courteously he had entertained all men, the people with their wives and children stayed in the way he came, to salute and see him: and wheresoever he came, with joyfull applauses and acclamations they cried, calling him their Conserver and Benefactor, and he who onely was worthy to be the Romane Emperour, and the whole Citie was as it had been a Temple all hung with garlands, and full of sweet odours and perfumes: and the multitude of the people being such that he could scarcely get into the palace, he offered sacrifices unto his household gods for his safe return, and all the people were feasted by their tribes, kindred and neighbours, sacrificing unto God, and requesting that Vespasian might long continue their Emperour, and his son after him, and that the Empire might never depart from his linage. The Citie of Rome having thus received Vespasian, it presently was blessed with all happinesse and felicitie.

CHAP. XXIII.

The causes of the revolt of the Germanes and French, from the Ro-manes.

Before such time as Vespasian was gone to Alexandria, or that Titus besieged the Citie of Jerusalem, a great part of Germany was revolted, with whom the Frenchmen that bordered upon them, renouncing their allegiance, they were in great hope to free themselves from the yoke and government of the Romanes. The first motives that caused the Germanes to revolt, and to warre against the Romanes, was their temeritie and rash natures prone to fight, having but a very little hope of successe; then the hatred of their nobles, who knew that none could by force bring them into subjection but onely the Romanes, and chiefly thereunto encouraged by the opportunitie they had. For they seeing the Empire greatly afflicted with civill wars, by reason

- A reason of the often changing of Emperours, and knowing that all the world under their dominion was now in suspence, they thought that by reason of their troubles and civill warres, fit opportunity was offered them, & they were hereunto perswaded by one Cassius and Civilis, two of the most potent amongst them, who long before desired alteration; and now finding opportunity, shewed what minds they bare: who now taking courage, made tryall what the common people thought of this point, and the greatest part of them manifestly condescended hereunto, and perhaps the rest were not unwilling. At this time, as it were by Gods providence, Vespasian sent letters unto Petilius Cerealis (who before-time had been Governour of Germanie) and declared him Consull, commanding him to go into Britaine and take the rule of the countrey. He forthwith obeyed Vespasians command: and hearing that the Germanes had revolted, he came against them, they having now levied an army, and gave them a great overthrow, killing many of them, and forced them to their due obedience unto the Romanes. Notwithstanding, if he had not come thither, not long after they had assuredly been punished for their offence. For so soon as news of their rebellion was brought to Rome, Cesar Domitianus hearing of it (not as one of his years would have done, being very young) undertook that expedition to go and conquer them: but having his fathers courage, and being more skilfull then his age required, he presently went against them: who terrified with the report of his coming, yeelded unto him, thereby gayning this that without bloodshed they were brought under subjection as before. Now all things in Gallia being well disposed of, so that it was not easie for them, although they would, to rebell any more, Domitianus returned againe to Rome, being a credit unto his age and countrey.

The Scythians and Sarmates rebellion against the Romanes,

- C At the same time also the Scythians rebelled, and the Sarmates assembled in great multitudes, and passed over the river Ister, and with great violence and crueltie coming unexpected, slew many of the Romane garrisons, whom they found in strong holds: and Pompeius Agrippas Lieutenant, who had been Consull, meeting them, bade them battell, and fought very valiantly: which done, they went all over the countries adjoining, wasting, robbing, and spoiling them. When Vespasian heard thereof, and how Mæsia was all wasted, he sent Rubrius Gallus to be revenged upon them: who having slain many of them in fight, he forced the rest to retire into their own countrey. The Generall of the armie having thus ended that warre, provided to prevent them, if hereafter they did attempt the like, for he built farre more stronger Forts then were before, so that the enemy could no way passe out of their own countrey: by which meanes the warres in Mæsia were quickly ended.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the River Sabbaticus, and the famous triumph of VESPASIAN and TITUS.

- E Thus the Emperour having some while remained at Berytus (as is before said) and being returned from thence, he shewed many spectacles in all the cities of Syria, wherein he came, reserving for that purpose the Jews that were captives, to let all men understand of their overthrow: in his journey, he beheld a river worth the recitall, which runneth in the midst between Arcas and Raphaneas, two cities of the kingdome of Agrippa, which had a miraculous nature: for when it floweth, it is very full of water, and runneth with a swift stream; yet having flowed six daies, it is on the seventh day so dry, that you may see the bottome, and so continueth his course, which for this cause the Jews called Sabbaticus, taking the name thereof from the Jews Sabbath, which is the seventh day. When the Antiochians understood that Titus was coming to their citie, they could not containe themselves within their wals for joy, but all went out to meet him, and not onely men, but also women and children, expecting his coming thirty stounds off: and when he approached neer unto them, they holding up their hands to him, saluted him with great joy, and having received many courtesies from him, they returned with him, and amongst other acclamations, they often besought him to banish the Jews out of their citie. But Titus returned no answer, making as though he heard not what they requested. Yet the Jews doubtfull what he would do, and what his intent was, were all in exceeding great feare. For Titus did not tarry at Antiochia, but passed from thence to Zeugma towards Euphrates, where Holagesus the King of Parthians messenger came unto him, bringing him a golden Crown for his conquest of the Jews: which he receiving, feasted the Kings Embassadors;

dours, and so returned to Antiochia, where the Senate and people besought him to come into the Theater, where all the people were assembled expecting him, and he accorded so to do: and againe they besought him to expell the Jews out of their city; but he answered that their countrey whereunto he might have banished them, was now destroyed, and there was no place that would receive them. So the Antiochians seeing they could not obtaine their former petition, requested another thing of him, to wit, that he would take away the brazen tables, wherein were engraven the Jews priviledges, but Titus would not grant that, but leaving the Jews in the same estate he found them, he departed from thence into Egypt: and as in the way he past by Jerusalem, comparing the defolation of that place with the beauty and goodly buildings that were before it was destroyed, he lamented and pitied the overthrow thereof, not insolently rejoycing as another would have done, for having destroyed so faire and strong a citie, but cursing the seditious who forced him to destroy it, not purposing to make his vertue knowne by the calamitie of wretches. For as yet great part of the treasure of the Citie was found in the ruines, and some the Romanes found of themselves, but the most they got, the captives told them of, which was gold and silver, and other precious things buried by the owners in the earth, being uncertaine what would betide them. Titus going forward in his journey speedily past the wilderness, and came to Alexandria: and determining now to sayle unto Italy, he sent the two legions that accompanied him unto the places, from whence they came, the fift into Masia, the fiftenth into Pannonia, commanding John and Simon Captaines of the prisoners and others, to the number of seven hundred, all of goodly stature, and beautifull, to be carried presently into Italy, meaning to use them in his triumph. When he was now arrived at Rome as he desired, the people were so affected towards him, as if he had been their father, and came to meet him. Vespasian also honoured his sonne Titus, meeting him in his own person with great joy: all the citizens likewise received him with exceeding joy, seeing that now the father and his two sonnes were met. Within a few dayes after they purposed to make a triumph in common, but the Senate had decreed them a private and peculiar triumph, for their valiant deeds: and in the day prefixed for the same, no man in all the Citie remained at home, but every one got a place to stand in, that they might see the Emperours, leaving onely roome between them for their passage. All the souldiers before it was day light, every one with his Captaine in companies, came and expected the Emperour, not at the Palace gate, but neere the Temple of Isis (for the Emperours that night lodged there) and at day-break Vespasian and Titus came forth both crowned with Lawrell, and in purple garments made after their countrey fashion, and they went unto Octavians walks, where the Senate, Captains and Knights expected their coming. Before the porch was made a tribunall, and in it placed seats of Ivory, which they ascending sate down in, and presently all the souldiers with loud voice declared their valour and fortitude. The Emperours were unarmed and cloathed in silk, and crowned with Lawrell. Vespasian having received their praises, they offering still to speake more in his commendations he beckned with his hand, and made a signe unto them to be silent: which being done, he arose up, and covering the greatest part of his head with his garment, he performed his solemne vowes, and Titus also did the like. That done, Vespasian spake unto them all in generall in few words, and so dismissed the souldiers to go to dinner, which according to the custome, the Emperour was to provide for them: himself departed from them to the triumphant gate so called, for that all triumphs passed that way, and they did cate meat, and put on triumphant apparell, having offered sacrifices unto the Gods that were placed by the gate, and so went in triumph all along the place where people strived to see them, to the end that all people might have a better view of them. But the spectacles there exhibited, both for number, varietie, and costlinesse, cannot be described sufficiently, being excellent in all things, which any man could devise, both workmanship, riches, and varieties, and novelties of nature. For almost all things that ever were in any place amongst men that lived in felicitie, either rich or beautifull, and pleasant to behold, all of them were that day shewed and scene in that triumph, giving a testimony of the large dominions of the Romanes. For there was such store of works of gold, silver, and Ivory, that one would not have deemed them to have beene made onely for the pompe of that day, but to have been so plentifull, as if they had flowed all about the citie: some carried fine tapestry made of all sorts of purple, other some carried others diligently wrought with pictures and Babylonian worke, and there were so many gemmes and precious stones, some set in crownes of gold, some in other works, that it appeared, that without reason, we judged them to be rare and scarce. Moreover, the pictures of their gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatnesse and workmanship, and all of precious matter. And divers

A sorts of living creatures were there to be seen, all adorned with some attire, agreeing and alluding unto their nature. There was also an infinite multitude of men, in purple garments over-wrought with gold, which carried all these things, and they who were separated from the rest to be seen, were attired in such garments, that as many as beheld them admired. The captives went not without their gorgeous attires, but the variety and beauty of the garments hid all the deformity of their bodies, which hapned through their bad usage. The Pageants that were borne in that triumph, were of an admirable bignesse, so that the people that beheld them, wondred how it was possible that men should carry them: for many were builded with three or foure lofts one above another, surpassing all that can be imagined of them for worke and cost, for many of them were hanged about with Tapestrie of gold, and all things annexed unto them, whereon they were carried, were made of wrought gold or Ivory.

B Therein was curiously represented the manner of warre, and all stratagems, and maners of fighting, that could be devised, some in one part of the Pageant, some in another. There might one have beheld a most fertill and fortunate land destroyed, and all the army of enemies to be slain, and some flying, other taken prisoners, and strong and huge wals battered down with Rammes, and Castles and strong holds destroyed, and the wals of populous Cities to be ruined, and the army entering the wals, all places filled with massacred men, and how those that were not able to fight, yeelding themselves, asked mercy, the Temples set on fire, and after all else was wasted, the houses throwne down upon the owners heads, and a river representing sorrow, not flowing as it was wont, into tilled places, and to serve the use of man, nor for cattell to drink, but into a countrey which was in every part burning, and environed with flames, all which the Jews in their warres endured. These things were so artificially represented unto their views that had not seen them, as though they were now a doing. Before every Pageant went the Captain of the City, representing the maner how it was taken. After all these followed many ships, and in every place were carried the spoils taken in warre: amongst all which, those that were taken in the Temple of Jerusalem, were most excellent, for there was a golden rable weighing many talents, and likewise a golden Candlestick, the use whereof was now not such as we were wont to put it unto, for in the midst of the stem thereof was fixed a bale, and out of it proceeded many small branches, framed like a three forked spear, every one being at the top made like a Lamp, which were seven in number, shewing the honour of the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath amongst the Jews. After all this, was carried the Jews Law, which was the last of all the spoils.

D Then followed many carrying the image of Victory, all made of gold and Ivory. Afterwards, came Vespasian, and after him Titus, and with him Domitian gallantly adorned and mounted upon an excellent horse, and so they went all to the Temple of Iupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pomp, where they made some abode.

E For it was an ancient custome of their countrey, to repose themselves there till some came and brought news unto them, of the death of him, who was Generall of their enemies. This as then was Simon Giora, who was also carried in the triumph, and having a rope fastned about his neck, was drawn all along the market place, where they that drew him did kill him. For it is the custome of the Romanes, there to put malefactors to death that are condemned.

F After word was brought that he was dead, all the people made joyfull exclamations, and so they began to sacrifice: which done according to the custome, they returned into the Palace, and they feasted some, other some had prepared banquets for themselves at their own houses. For this day was sacred amongst the Romanes, in joy of the victory over their enemies, and an end of civill calamitie, and the beginning of good fortune, and hope, which they had in their new Princes. When the triumphs were ended, and all the Romane Empire quieted, Vespasian built a Temple, and dedicated it unto Peace, which he did in so short a space as it was admirable: and having bestowed great cost upon it, he also beautified it with divers pictures and carved works. And he placed in that Temple all things that men of former ages had come to see, from the uttermost parts of the earth. And he placed there all the golden vessels, and other necessities that the Jews used in their Temple, doing them great reverence. But their law and the Tapestrie or purple veils of the Sanctuary he commanded to be kept in the Palace.

How Herodium and Macharus were taken by Bassus.

CÆSAR sent Lucius Bassilius into Judæa to be Lieutenant there, who receiving an army of Cerealis Vesilianus, he took the castle and garrison of Herodium, being yeelded unto him. After this, gathering together all his army, who were dispersed in divers places of the countrey, he with the tenth legion purposed to warre against Macharus, for he thought it necessary to destroy that castle, lest that for the strength it might move many to rebell: for by reason of the situation of the place, they that were in it, had certain hope of their safety, and those that sought to assault it, were in great danger. For it was built upon a rock that was exceeding high, which made it almost inexpugnable, and nature had so devised, that it is hard to come unto it, who hath environed it round about with valleys, so deep, that the bottome thereof cannot be descried, neither could one passe over them, nor fill them up: for that which is on the West part is threescore founts large, and endeth at the lake Asphaltites, and on this side Macharus hath a very high prospect, and it is invironed on the North & South with valleys of the like measure that the former is, whereby it is impossible to winne the Castle: but that valley which is on the East side, is at least a hundred cubits deep, and it endeth upon a mountain neer unto Macharus. King Alexander seeing the nature of the place did there build a Castle, which afterward Gabinus in the warre against Aristobulus destroyed. But Herod when he was King, judged this place worthy to be fortified, as a principall defence against the neighbouring Arabians. For it was aptly situate upon a mountain, where one might behold their borders: wherefore making a large wall, he builded a City there in the place that men do enter unto the Castle: he also compassed the very top thereof with another wall, and in the corners he placed towers that were threescore cubits high, and in the very midst of all he built a Palace, for largenesse and beaurty admirable, and made many cisterns to receive water in convenient places, which served the people abundantly, as it were striving with nature, that the places which he had made inexpugnable, he by Art might make places more strong then that was. He also laid up there in store, arrows and engines, and made all provision wherewith the inhabitants might be able to hold out a great siege.

Rue, of admirable greatnes.

Another fashion how to dig the root.

In the Kings Palace, there grew the hearb called Rue, which was very admirable for the greatnesse, for there was no fig-tree taller or broader then it: and it was reported that it had continued ever since Herods time, and had endured longer, had not the Jews inhabitants of the place cut it down. In the valley that lieth on the North side of the City, there is a place called Baaras, where also groweth a root of the same name, the colour whereof resembleth the flame, and it shineth at night like the Sunne beams, and is not easie to be pulled up, till that one cast upon it the urine of a woman or her flowers: which done, whosoever toucheth it is sure to die, except he carry the root hanging on his hand. It is also gathered another way without danger, after this maner: They dig all round about it, so that they leave a very little of the root covered with earth, and then they tie a dog unto it, which striving to follow his master who maketh as though he would go away, he easily pulleth up the root, and the dog presently dieth, as it were in his stead that seeketh to get it, so that afterward none that handleth it or taketh it, need to stand in any fear thereof. This hearb notwithstanding all this danger is diligently sought out for the vertue it hath. For it driveth away devils (which are the spirits of wicked men) out of mens bodies, if it be but applyed unto them, whereas otherwise if they had no help, these devils possessing their bodies would kill them. Out of that place also do spring certain hot waters, very different in taste one from another, for some are bitter, some sweet, there are also sources of cold waters, one neer unto another in a Plain: but which is most admirable, there is a cave hard by, not very deep, environed with an eminent rock above, from the which there cometh as it were two dugges or paps, hard by one another, and out of the one of them there floweth very cold water, out of the other very hot, which mingled together make a pleasant bath, and serve to cure many diseases, and especially helpeth all pains of the finews. In the same place also are mines of Sulphure and Alume.

Bassus having viewed this place on every side, resolved to besiege it, and endeavoured to fill up the valley that was on the East side, and so make a way unto it: which he began to do, hastning

A hastning to raise a very high mount, and so make it easie to be taken. Those that were inhabitants, constrained the Jews that were strangers, to go into the lower City, judging them an unprofitable multitude, and so caused them to endure the first brunt of the enemies, and they themselves kept the Castle, both for that it was strong, and also to preserve themselves, hoping that by yeelding the place unto the Romanes, they might obtaine pardon of them; yet first they purposed to make triall if they could avoide the siege: and therefore very courageously, every day they made excursions, and fought with them: they found, and many were slaine on both parts. Fortune and opportunity sometime caused one to be victors, sometime another: for the Jews got the best when they could assault the Romanes, at unawares, and the Romanes overcame, when they were aware of the Jews coming and armed themselves. But the siege was not ended by these skirmishes: yet a chance befell, that forced the Jews to yeeld their Castle. Amongst them that were besieged was one Elezar a young man, and very hardy and bold in any enterprize, who oftentimes made excursions and sought to hinder the Romanes worke, who alwayes in every fight did greatly endamage the Romanes, and by his valour and adventurous courage, he gave them that were his fellowes opportunity to assault the Romanes, and to flie again and retire in safety, himself being alwaies the last that so retired. It hapned one day that the fight being ended, and both parts parted, he as it were contemning all men, and thinking that none of his enemies durst undertake to combat with him, staid without the gate, speaking to them that were upon the wall, and giving great attention unto them. Then one Rufus an Egyptian one of the Romanes army, espying this opportunity, ran upon him so suddenly, that he at unawares tooke him all armed as he was, and they upon the wals stood amazed; whilest Rufus led him unto the Romanes campe: Then the Generall of the Romanes caused him to be led into a place, where they in the City might see him, and there to have all his cloaths taken off him, and whipped; and the misfortune of this young man did greatly discourage the Jews, and all the city was resolved into teares for the calamity of that one man. Bassus seeing this, he devised this counsell against them; for he sought to move them so to compassion, that for to save him they should yeeld their castle: which fell out as he desired. For he presently commanded a crosse to be erected, as though he would presently have crucified Elezar: which sight greatly moved them in the Castle to sorrow: so that now with loud cries they lamented, saying that this calamity was insupportable: Then Elezar besought them not to despise him, who was now to die a most miserable death: and moreover to provide for their own safety in yeelding the Castle unto the Romanes vertue and fortunate successe.

Then they moved with his words, and many also within the City intreating for him (for he came of a great parentage and had many kinsfolks) though contrary to their natures, compassion took place in them: and so sending some of their company speedily, they desired to parley, affirming they would yeeld their Castle upon condition that they might safely depart away, and Elezar might be likewise restored unto them. Which offer of theirs the Romanes accepted; and the Jews in the lower part of the City having intelligence of this covenant, resolved themselves to flie away in the night: but so soone as they had opened their gates, those that had agreed with Bassus, gave him intelligence thereof, either envying that their countrey men should escape, or else fearing that Bassus would punish them for their flight: yet for all this, the most valiant of them that fled, escaped, who were gone before the rest, and the rest were slaine to the number of 1000. and 700. men, for the women and children were made bondslaves. invaded Armenia.

Cesennius Pe-tus President of Syria, accu-
before Cesar.

IN the fourth year of Vespasian's reigne, it hapned that Antiochus King of the Comagenes with all his family fell into great misery upon this occasion: Cesenni- us Petus Governour of Syria (either for envy, or for that indeed it was so, for it is not well knowne) sent letters unto Cesar, declaring unto him that Antiochus was determined to revolt from the Romanes, together with his sonne Epi- phanes, and had made a league with the King of the Parthians, and that therefore it was necessary to prevent them in time, lest that if they first began to revolt openly, they might trouble all the Romane Empire with warres. Cesar did not neglect these newes, for that the neereneesse of both the Kings countries one to another, seemed to require that they should be quickly prevented: for Samosata the greatest Citie of Comagena is situate upon Euphra- tes, which might both easily receive the Parthians, and be a strong hold for them, and also there they might easily passe over the river. Wherefore Vespasian beleeving it, permitted him to do what he thought expedient: and he forthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, suddenly entred into Comagena, with the sixth legion, and certaine other companies of footmen and troupes of horsemen, accompanied with Aristobolus King of Chalcis, and Sabennus King of Emesa, who came to assist him. So they entred the countrey without any fight, for none of the inhabitants offered to resist. Antiochus daunted with these unexpected newes, did not so much as thinke of any warre against the Romanes, wherefore he determined to leave the whole kingdome in that estate that then it was in, and with his wife and children depart from thence, hoping hereby to cleare himselfe unto the Romanes, from that which they suspected of him: and going almost a hundred and thirty stounds from the City into a field, there he placed a tabernacle. And Petus sent men unto Samosata to take it, and left them to keep the City, and he with the rest of the souldiers purposed to go against Antiochus. But for all this the King though by necessity urged thereto, yet would he not fight against the Ro-manes, but bewailing his misfortune, endured patiently all whatsoever: but his sons being lusty strong young men, and skilfull in martiall affaires, could not easily abstaine from fight in that their distresse. Wherefore Epiphanes and Callinicus his two sonnes had recourse unto their forces, and in a great fight that endured a whole day, they shewed their valour, and departed receiving no losse. But Antiochus after this fight would not any longer abide in his countrey, but taking his wife and daughters he fled into Cilicia, and thereby discouraged his souldiers, who despairing to keep the kingdome for him, revolted unto the Romanes.
But Epiphanes and the rest were forced to seeke to save themselves, before such time as they were left destitute, and so accompanied with ten horsemen they passed the river Euphrates: and thus being out of danger they came to Vologesus, of whom they were received, not as fugitives, but with great honour, and according to their degree, as though they yet possessed their ancient dignitie. And Petus coming to Tarsus of Cilicia, he sent a Centurion to carry Antiochus bound unto Rome. But Vespasian permitted not a King to be so brought

How Massada a most strong Castle was taken.

D B Assus dying in Judæa, Flavius Silva succeeded in his place, and now perceiving that all the countrey else were conquered save one onely Castle, he with all the forces he could make went against it. This Castle is called Massada. The Capitaine of the Sicarians named Eleazar, who first invaded it, was a very strong and valiant man, borne of the tribe of Juda, who perswaded a great many Jews as is before said, not to enroule themselves when Cyrenæus was Censor, and sent to taxe Judæa. For at that time the Sicarians had conspired against them that obeyed the Romanes, and in all things used them like enemies, taking and driving away their goods, and firing their houses, affirming that they did not any thing differ from strangers, who betrayed the liberty of their countrey, rather then they would fight for it, and that they had rather have them war on the Romanes side. But that was onely an excuse to hide their avarice and injurious dealing, as the prooffe made manifest, for they themselves revolted and bare armes against the Romanes, and their enterprizes against the Romanes were worse then the rest, and when their first forged pretence was knowne and confuted, they did rage more then before against those that upbraided them with it. For that time amongst the Jews abounded with all manner of iniquity, so that none was left undone: yea though one indeavoured to invent some new vallanies, yet could he devise none that was not then practised: all laboured with this maladie, both in particular and in common, and every one did strive with other, to surpass his fellow in impiety against God, and injustice towards his neighbour. The mighty vexed the weaker sort, and the meaner sort destroyed the Potentates, and took their riches away from them; they gaped after rule and dominion, these after mischief.

The time
among the Jews which was most fruit-full in all manner of impiety.

E The Sicarians were the first that were so cruell and injurious against their neighbours: for not provoked thereunto, neither by deed nor word, they slew and injured all men without cause, but Iohn shewed them to be very moderate. For he did not onely slay all that counselled that which was good and profitable, as his greatest enemies, and especially dealing thus with the citizens, but also many waies injured his countrey, like one who had impiously also condemned God himself. For he did eat forbidden meats, and violated his countries temperance: so that it was no wonder to see him observe no justice nor fidelity towards men, who had now infringed the laws of God. Againe, what villianie did Simon Giora leave undone, or what injurie did he abstaine from to offer unto their bodies, who had chosen him for their ruler? What did kindred and friendship then prevail any man? save onely this, that it made them be more cruelly used, and every day to be more tyrannously butchered, then otherwise. For they thought it a hainous offence to abuse strangers, and a glory to exercise crueltie upon their most familiar friends. The Idumzans were followers of this fury, who killed the high Priests, and left not any one of note in the City, whereby God might be honoured, and induced all injustice possible, wherein the Zealous excelled. For they committed all mischief, leaving nothing unattempted that had ever before that time been practised: yet they took their name from them that imitated good and godlinesse, but in truth it was to mock and flout them that did well: so savage and cruell was their nature, or else accounting the greatest impiety to be goodnesse. But their end was as they deserved, God punished their desert with his just vengeance. For even unto the latter end of their lives, they endured all the miseries that is possible for mans nature to abide, being killed with divers sorts of torments. Perhaps one will say that their punishment was not so great as they deserved: but what punishment could be devised sufficient for their deserts? But I cannot now stand to lament those who perished by these mens crueltie: Wherefore I will return to that where I left.

The Romane Captaine came against Elazar, and them that kept Massada with him, who were Sicarians, and he brought an army with him, and presently subdued all the confines and borders round about, and he placed in every fit place garrisons, and environed the Castle with a wall, lest any of them that were besieged should escape, and that they that besieged them might there keepe a continuall guard. Moreover, he placed his camp in a fit place for the siege, even there where the rock, that the Castle was built upon, joyned unto the other mountaine, which was an unfit place to get necessities in. For not onely victuals were fetcht farre off by great labour of the Jews who were commanded to do it, but also water for the whole army somewhere else, for there was no fountain neere that place. This done, Silva attempted the siege, wherein it was requisite for him to use both art and labour, by reason of the strength of the Castle, which is thus situate: It is invironed round with a huge stone very high on every side, and the vally underneath is so deep, that one cannot see the bottome, all rockie, and inaccessible to all living creatures, save onely that in two places there is a difficult passage unto it, one of them is from the lake Asphaltites towards the East, and the eastest of the two is the West side: the first is called a Snake, taking his name of the straitnesse and crooked turnings, for the rock that is eminent, seemeth as it were broken in sunder, and by little and little often returneth againe unto it self, and it is by little and little extended in length, so that he that goeth that way, can make no haft, but must step with one foot first upon them, and the other upon another, and must stand upon one foot whilest he removeth the other, and he that falleth is sure to be slaine in the fall: for there is such a hollow place on either side betweene the rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldest man alive. When thou hast gone thirty foulds by this way, then thou comest to the toppe of the hill, which is not steep at the top, but hath a Plaine about it, and Jonathan the high Priest was the first that built a castle in this place, and called it Massada: and Herod after him bestowed great labour and cost in building that place, for he environed it with a wall, seven foulds circuit, all of white stone, twelue cubits high and eight cubits broad, and placed upon it seven and twenty towers that were fifty cubits high, by the which men passed into the houses that were round about the wall within: for the King appointed the top of the hill for tillage, because it was a more fertill and fatter soyl then any ground else, so that if at any time they within the Castle wanted provision from other places, yet they might not be famished, having this to finde them. He also builded in this place a Palace for himself, the way to which was on the West side within the castle wall, whose prospect was toward the North, and environed the same with a most strong wall, and in the corners thereof he built foure most firme towers threescore cubits high, very sumptuous within, having divers roomes and galleries and baths, supported in every place with pillars, every one of which was one onely stone, the wals thereof were of solid stone of divers colours: and to every house, and in the top of the hill, and round about the Palace, he hewed certaine cisternes out of the rocke for to beare water, so that by this meanes water was as plentifull, as though they had fountains within the Castle. There was a way unto the castle under the ground & from the Kings Palace, which they that were without could not perceive, the way above ground was inaccessible, for as we have already

A already said, the way on the East side no man could passe, and as for that on the West side, it was stopt up with a tower built in the streight thereof distant a thousand cubits from the Castle, by which it was impossible to passe, and it was not easie to get it by force, and the more leisurely they went, the neerer they were to danger. And thus was this Fortresse strengthened both by art and nature.

A tower to the West side. Great store of provision in the Castle.

B The provision within the Castle was admirable both for the magnificence thereof, and also for the long time it had continued, for there was Corne sufficient for many yeers, and Wine and Oyle and divers other provision and heapes of Dates. All which Eleazar found ready there, having deceitfully obtained the Castle with his Sicarians, which provision was all as sound and as fresh, as though it had newly been layd up in store: notwithstanding, that from the time it remained there, unto the time that the Romanes took it, were a hundredth yeers, and the Romanes found the reliques of the fruit incorrupted: and one may justly thinke that the cause hereof is the ayre about the Castle, which by reason of the height of the place is most pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was also found all maner of Armor in great quantity, which Herod made, and would have armed ten thousand men; also unwrought iron, brasle, and lead, so that one may judge that provision to have been reserved for some great cause. It is reported that Herod prepared that Castle for his refuge, when he doubted two great dangers, first, that the people of the Jews would despoise him; and make them Kings whose ancestors had before reigned.

Fruit for an hundred yeers kept uncorrupt.

C The other which was more dangerous then the first, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, who not concealing her intent, did often request Antonius that Herod might be slain, and that she might have the Kingdome of the Jews given unto her. And it was a great marvaile that Antonius doting so upon her, did not fulfill her request. Herod for these occasions having builded Massada, left it unfurnished at the last bulwarke for the Romanes to make warre against the Jews. For the Generall of the Romanes, having now compassed all the place without it with a wall, (as is before said) to the end that none might escape, he did very wisely, and so began to assault the Castle, finding one onely place that would bear a mount. For behinde the Tower that on the West side stopped up the passage into the Castle and Palace, there was a great rocke very large and long, yet not so high as Massada by three hundredth cubits. The rocke was called Leuce, which signifieth white.

D When Silva had gotten this rocke, and ascended it, he commanded his souldiers to build a mount thereupon, and they chearefully labouring, raised a sudden mount two hundredth cubits high: by reason of the height it seemed not firme nor sufficient enough to beare the engines, but upon it was built a Tribunall with great stones fifty cubits high, and as many cubits broad, and the engines were such as first Vespasian, and after him Titus devised to batter wals with, and so they made a Tower three score cubits high, all plated about with iron.

There was but one place about Massada to raise a mount to batter on.

E Now the Romanes with many shot did drive the Jews from off the Castle wals, not suffering them to lift up their heads. And Silva having builded a mighty Ramme, caused the wall to be continually battered therewith, but it could scarcely enter upon it: and the Sicarians quickly prevented that, building another wall within, which could not be broken with the Ramme being yet soft, and so would break the force thereof, for they did sawe timber in pieces, and as it were made two railes, and then filled the space between the two railes with earth, and with other planks they kept the earth from falling down, so that they made a worke like the wall of a house, and for that it yeilded unto the blowes of the Ramme (being soft earth) the Ramme could not prevaile against it, but rather made it more strong then before, by ramming the mortar together.

The City battered with a large Ramme, and by Silvas appointment.

F Silva perceiving this, judged that he might sooner destroy the wall with fire then with his engine: and so he commanded the souldiers to cast upon it many burning firebrands, and the fire did quickly take hold of the wall, because it was for the most part built with wood, and easily also pearced thorow it, by reason it was not clean wrought together, and there was a great flame.

Firebrands darted against the walls.

At the very beginning of the fire, the North winde did greatly annoy the Romanes, for the fire blowing furiously from above against them that were Romanes, it did drive it extremely upon them, so that they were in great despaire, fearing their engines would be burnt, and presently the winde changing and blowing from the South, (as it were by Gods providence) it turned the fire againe upon the wall, and now all of it even unto the foundation thereof, was there most cruelly on fire. And the Romanes having Gods assistance, returned againe into their campe joyfully, purposing the next morning betimes to assaile their enemies, and that night to place stronger watches, lest any of the enemies should escape. But perance: so that it was no wonder to see him observe no justice nor fidelity towards men, who had now infringed the laws of God. Again, what villianie did Simon Giora leave undone, or what injurie did he abstaine from to offer unto their bodies, who had chosen him for their ruler? What did kindred and friendship then prevail any man? save onely this, that it made them be more cruelly used, and every day to be more tyrannously butchered, then otherwise. For they thought it a hainous offence to abuse strangers, and a glory to exercise crueltie upon their most familiar friends. The Idumzeans were followers of this fury, who killed the high Priests, and left not any one of note in the City, whereby God might be honoured; and induced all injustice possible, wherein the Zealous excelled. For they committed all mischief, leaving nothing unattempted that had ever before that time been practised: yet they took their name from them that imitated good and godlinesse, but in truth it was to mock and flout them that did well: so savage and cruell was their nature, or else accounting the greatest impiety to be goodnesse. But their end was as they deserved, God punished their desert with his just vengeance. For even unto the latter end of their lives, they endured all the miseries that is possible for mans nature to abide, being killed with divers sorts of torments. Perhaps one will say that their punishment was not so great as they deserved: but what punishment could be devised sufficient for their deserts? But I cannot now stand to lament those who perished by these mens crueltie: Wherefore I will return to that where I left.

The Romane Captaine came against Eleazar, and them that kept Maslada with him, who were Sicarians, and he brought an army with him, and presently subdued all the confines and borders round about, and he placed in every fit place garrisons, and environed the Castle with a wall, lest any of them that were besieged should escape, and that they that besieged them might there keepe a continuall guard. Moreover, he placed his camp in a fit place for the siege, even there where the rock, that the Castle was built upon, joyned unto the other mountaine, which was an unfit place to get necessaries in. For not onely victuals were fetcht farre off by great labour of the Jews who were commanded to do it, but also water for the whole army somewhere else, for there was no fountain neere that place. This done, Silva attempted the siege, wherein it was requisite for him to use both art and labour, by reason of the strength of the Castle, which is thus situate: It is environed round with a huge stone very high on every side, and the vally underneath is so deep, that one cannot see the bottome, all rockie, and inaccessible to all living creatures, save onely that in two places there is a difficult passage unto it, one of them is from the lake Asphaltites towards the East, and the east of the two is the West side: the first is called a Snake, taking his name of the straitnesse and crooked turnings, for the rock that is eminent, seemeth as it were broken in sunder, and by little and little often returneth againe unto it self, and it is by little and little extended in length, so that he that goeth that way, can make no hast, but must step with one foot first upon them, and the other upon another, and must stand upon one foot whilest he removeth the other, and he that falleth is sure to be slaine in the fall: for there is such a hollow place on either side betweene the rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldest man alive. When thou hast gone thirty stounds by this way, then thou comest to the toppe of the hill, which is not steep at the top, but hath a Plaine about it, and Jonathan the high Priest was the first that built a castle in this place, and called it Maslada: and Herod after him bestowed great labour and cost in building that place, for he environed it with a wall, seven stounds circuit, all of white stone, twelve cubits high and eight cubits broad, and placed upon it seven and twenty towers that were fifty cubits high, by the which men passed into the houses that were round about the wall within: for the King appointed the top of the hill for tillage, because it was a more fertill and fatter soyl then any ground else, so that if at any time they within the Castle wanted provision from other places, yet they might not be famished, having this to finde them. He also builded in this place a Palace for himself, the way to which was on the West side within the castle wall, whose prospect was toward the North, and environed the same with a most strong wall, and in the corners thereof he built foure most firme towers three-score cubits high, very sumptuous within, having divers roomes and galleries and baths, supported in every place with pillars, every one of which was one onely stone, the wals thereof were of solid stone of divers colours: and to every house, and in the top of the hill, and round about the Palace, he hewed certaine cisternes out of the rocke for to beare water, so that by this meanes water was as plentifull, as though they had fountains within the Castle. There was a way unto the castle under the ground & from the Kings Palace, which they that were without could not perceive, the way above ground was inaccessible, for as we have already

A already said, the way on the East side no man could passe, and as for that on the West side, it was stopp'd up with a tower built in the streight thereof distant a thousand cubits from the Castle, by which it was impossible to passe, and it was not easie to get it by force, and the more leisurely they went, the neerer they were to danger. And thus was this Fortresse strengthened both by art and nature.

The year of the world, 4038. after Claudit Maritine, 76.

The provision within the Castle was admirable both for the magnificence thereof, and also for the long time it had continued, for there was Corne sufficient for many yeers, and Wine and Oyle and divers other provision and heapes of Dates. All which Eleazar found ready there, having deceitfully obtained the Castle with his Sicarians, which provision was all as sound and as fresh, as though it had newly been layd up in store: notwithstanding, that from the time it remained there, unto the time that the Romanes took it, were a hundredth years, and the Romanes found the reliques of the fruit incorrupted: and one may justly thinke that the cause hereof is the ayre about the Castle, which by reason of the height of the place is most pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was also found all maner of Armor in great quantity, which Herod made, and would have armed ten thousand men; also unwrought iron, brasie, and lead, so that one may judge that provision to have been reserved for some great cause. It is reported that Herod prepared that Castle for his refuge, when he doubted two great dangers, first, that the people of the Jews would despoise him, and make them Kings whose ancestors had before reigned.

Fruit for an hundred yeers kept incorrupt.

The other which was more dangerous then the first, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, who not concealing her intent, did often request Antonius that Herod might be slain, and that she might have the Kingdome of the Jews given unto her. And it was a great marvaile that Antonius doting so upon her, did not fulfill her request. Herod for these occasions having builded Massada, left it unfurnished at the last bulwarke for the Romanes to make warre against the Jews. For the Generall of the Romanes, having now compassed all the place without it with a wall, (as is before said) to the end that none might escape, he did very wisely, and so began to assault the Castle, finding one onely place that would bear a mount. For behinde the Tower that on the West side stopp'd up the passage into the Castle and Palace, there was a great rocke very large and long, yet not so high as Massada by three hundredth cubits. The rocke was called Leuce, which signifieth white.

D When Silva had gotten this rocke, and ascended it, he commanded his souldiers to build a mount thereupon, and they chearefully labouring, raised a sudden mount two hundredth cubits high: by reason of the height it seemed not firme nor sufficient enough to beare the engines, but upon it was built a Tribunall with great stones fifty cubits high, and as many cubits broad, and the engines were such as first Vespasian, and after him Titus devised to batter wals with, and so they made a Tower threescore cubits high, all plated about with iron.

There was but one place about Massada to raise a mount to batter on.

Now the Romanes with many shot did drive the Jews from off the Castle wals, not suffering them to lift up their heads. And Silva having builded a mighty Ramme, caused the wall to be continually battered therewith, but it could scarcely enter upon it: and the Sicarians quickly prevented that, building another wall within, which could not be broken with the Ramme being yet soft, and so would break the force thereof, for they did sawe timber in pieces, and as it were made two railes, and then filled the space between the two railes with earth, and with other planks they kept the earth from falling down, so that they made a worke like the wall of a house, and for that it yeelded unto the blowes of the Ramme (being soft earth) the Ramme could not prevaile against it, but rather made it more strong then before, by ramming the mortar together.

Silva perceiving this, judged that he might sooner destroy the wall with fire then with his engine: and so he commanded the souldiers to cast upon it many burning firebrands, and the fire did quickly take hold of the wall, because it was for the most part built with wood, and easily also pearced thorow it, by reason it was not clean wrought together, and there was Firebrands darter against the walls.

F a great flame.

At the very beginning of the fire, the North winde did greatly annoy the Romanes, for the fire blowing furiously from above against them that were Romanes, it did drive it extremely upon them, so that they were in great despaire, fearing their engines would be burnt, and presently the winde changing and blowing from the South, (as it were by Gods providence) it turned the fire againe upon the wall, and now all of it even unto the foundation thereof, was there most cruelly on fire. And the Romanes having Gods assistance, returned againe into their campe joyfully, purposing the next morning betimes to assaile their enemies, and that night to place stronger watches, lest any of the enemies should escape. But

Eleazar thought not to flie, neither would he permit any one of his company so to do. And seeing now the wall was fiered, and not knowing any way else to help himself, considering likewise what the Romanes would do unto their wives and children if they should take them, he deliberated of all their deaths, which he in that extremity judged to be the best way they could take. And so he assembled the most valiant of all his company and exhorted every one thereunto, after this maner:

Valiant Champions, we long ago resolved our selves neither to serve the Romanes, nor any other save onely God, for he alone is the true and just Lord of all men. Behold, the time is now come, that exhorteth you to shew your resolute mindes: let us not therefore dishonour our selves, and besides our slavery, suffer also intolerable torments if we be taken alive by the Romanes. For we were the first that revoked from them, and the last that warred against them. And I verily thinke that God hath given us this benefit, that we may dye well in our own libertie, which he denied to others who were overcome contrary to all expectation. We are certaine to be conquered as soon as it is day-light: but to die valiantly with our dearest friends, is a glorious resolution unto valiant men, and of this our enemies cannot debarre us, who do labour to take us alive, and carry us away captives, and we are not able to vanquish them in fight. For truly at the first (when we who coveted liberty, suffered all misery at the hands of our own countrey men, and worse at the hands of our enemies) we should have considered that God, who was sometime favourable unto the Nation of the Jews, had now condemned them unto perdition: for had he yet been favourable unto us, or had he been but lightly offended at us, he would not have permitted so many men to have perished, and have delivered his holy city into the hands of the enemies to be consumed with fire. And we onely amongst all our nation, hoped to live in liberty as though we had no waies offended the divine Majesty, nor been guilty of any offence, who indeed taught others iniquity. So you see how we are checked for longing after vaine hope, being brought into greater extremity then we expected. Neither hath our Castle by nature inexpugnable, any thing profited us to our preservation, but we having store of victuals and armour, and all other necessities, have lost all hope of safety, God himself openly taking it from us. For the fire that once was carried against our enemies, did not of it self returne against us and unto the wall we built. But it was the punishment of our offences, who furiously raged against our own Nation. For the which I request you, let us not be punished by the Romanes, whose forces are invincible, but by our selves let us satisfie the ire of God, and so it will be more tolerable for us; even by that meanes our wives shall die undefiled, and our children shall not taste of servile captivity. After whose deaths, we will one help another to die with credit, concerning our liberty, which is the best sepulture of all: yet let us first fire our Castle, and burne our treasure: for it will be no small griefe unto the Romanes, if they neither get our bodies alive, nor can finde any one jot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let us onely leave our victuals as a sufficient testimony, that famine did not at any time cause us to be conquered, but that we, as at first we resolved, preferred death before bondage.

Eleazar having thus spoken, they that were present did not all accord unto him, for some joyfully hasted to execute his advice thinking it so glorious a death. But they who moved with compassion towards their wives and families, were something effeminate, or else abhorred to kill themselves, one looking upon another with teares, did shew his minde to disagree from that which Eleazar perswaded. Which when Eleazar perceived, and that his counsell through feare was defeated, fearing also that they who courageously had accorded thereunto, would be withdrawn by the tears of others, he did not so end his exhortation; but standing up, and with a vehement spirit, he began to speake unto them of the immortality of the soule, and fixing his eyes upon them that wept, he used a vehement exclamation, saying:

How much am I deceived, who thought that valiant men fighting for their libertie, would rather choose to die then to live? but ye do shew your selves nothing to excell any ordinary men, who feare to die, notwithstanding that thereby you may escape great misery, and calamity, when in this point you ought not to have expected any admonition thereunto, nor to have made any delay to do it. The ancient customes, which have endured ever since men had reason, the divine doctrine of our nation, which hath continually been confirmed by the deeds of our predecessors, do instruct us, that it is misery to live, and not to die. For death freeth our souls from prison unto their most pure and proper place, where never after they shall be touched with calamity. Which whilest they are bound in a mortall bodie, and do participate of his miseries, may probably be affirmed to be dead. For it is an unseemly conjunction

- A conjunction for that which is divine, to be coupled and connexed unto that which is mortall. True it is, that our souls can do much being joyned to our bodies, for they use the bodies as their instruments, secretly producing in them motion, and many other actions passing the nature of mortall things. But when the soule is loosed from that heavy burthen which doth weigh it down even unto the earth, which hangeth upon it, and hath received his proper habitation, then it enjoyeth free and perfect felicity, and remaineth invisible to our mortall eyes as God himself is, neither is it visible in our bodies. For it cometh secretly into them, and so departeth from them againe, that no man can perceive it, having onely a nature incorrupt, and causing a change in our bodies. For whatsoever the soule toucheth, that presently liveth and flourisheth, and what it forsaketh, that incontinently withereth and dieth: so much doth it participate of immortality. The sleep may be an evident argument unto you of this which I speak, where the soul not distracted taketh a most pleasant and sweet repose; and communicating with God, it is with him present in every place by reason of affinity, and foretelleth many future events. Wherefore should we then fear death, who love the rest that we have in sleep? were not he a mad man that for a short life would hinder himself of eternall life? It were necessary that we who are instructed in the law of our nation, should give example to others to despise and contemne death. But if we seeke confirmation hereof from strangers, let us see the example amongst the wiser sort of the Indians: for they being just men do tolerate this life as a necessary office of nature for a certaine time, though against their wils, yet do they hasten to unloose the soule bound in this mortall body, though not urged thereunto by any calamity or necessity, but onely for desire of immortality, telling others that they will depart out of this life; neither doth any one seek to hinder them, but all men esteeming them most fortunate, send by them commendations and other messages unto their friends departed: so firme is their belief that the souls of them that are dead have communion and conversation together: And so they having all instruction what to say to the souls departed, do with great applause leap into the fire, that thereby their souls may be purified from their bodies. And their friends go more joyfully with them when they go to their deaths, then any doth that bringeth his friend on the way when he is to go a great journey; and they bewaile themselves, not those who are dead and have attained immortality. Shall not we then be ashamed not to beleieve so firmly as the Indians do? despising through our own sloth our countrey laws which are to be emulated of all men? Nay, supposing that by our law we had bin instructed contrariwise, to wit, that to live in this life is blisse, and to die is calamity: yet notwithstanding this present necessity, this present time had been a sufficient motive to cause us to embrace death rather then life, seeing that by Gods appointment, and of necessity we must now die. In times past it appeareth God so provided, that he shortened their daies of our own nation, that would not use their life as they ought to have done. I dare not ascribe it unto the Romanes, nor report of our selves that their wars consumed us all. For this did not happen through their forces, but a more potent cause hereof there was which made them conquerors. Which of the Romanes slew the Jews that inhabited at Cæsarea? whom the inhabitants thereof upon the Sabbath day, they being assembled in one place together with their wives and children, did massacre, notwithstanding that they had no intent to revolt from them, nor never lifted up their hands in their own defence, nothing fearing the Romanes, who onely accounted them of our nation their enemies that revolted from them. But some may object, the Jews at Cæsarea, and the inhabitants thereof were alwaies at variance, and that now they revenged their old quarrell, having gotten opportunity. What then shall we say of the Scythopolitans? who bare armes with the Græcians against us, and denied to assist their own kindred against the Romanes. What profit did they receive by this their good will and fidelity? for they were altogether with their whole families cruelly slaine, and this was the reward they had for their labour, for having withstood us to have done the like unto them; it were too long to recount all things severally to this effect. For as ye know there is no city in all Syria that hath not massacred the Jews there inhabiting, being more our enemies then the Romanes were, where they of Damascus, although they could not devise any probable cause for it, yet did they massacre all the Jews living among them, who amounted to the number of eighteen thousand, beside their wives and families. And as we have heard it reported, the number of the Jews slaine by the Egyptians, were above threescore thousand: It may be that finding no adversity in a strange countrey, they were put to death by their enemies: but they that in their own countrey fought against the Romanes, wanted nothing that might have caused a perfect hope of a full victory over the Romanes, they had weapons, armour, wals, and strong holds inexpugnable; their valorous courage in fighting for liberty shunned no danger, and encouraged men to revolt: which all, having a while served their turnes, at last was a cause of their greater misery. For all were taken and subdued by the enemies, as though they had been built and made to make their enemies victory more famous, and not to do them service. And we may justly deeme them happy who were slaine in the warre, for they died in liberty. Yet who doth not pity the multitude of them that fell into the Romanes hands; or who would not hasten to die, rather then endure the like misery that they suffered? Some of them being tortured, and some with fire and stripes perished; and others halfe eaten of wilde beasts, were reserved alive for their second food: and they are most miserable of all that are yet alive, who often wish for death and cannot finde it. Where is now that gorgeous City? where is it that was once the mother City of all the nation of the Jews? so strengthened with such strong wals, so fortified with towers and castles to defend the wals, scarcely able to contain the provision made for warre, having in it so huge a multitude of men to fight for it; what is it now become, wherein God himself was thought to dwell? It is now razed down even unto the very foundations; and no other memory or reliques thereof is left standing, their campe is destroyed, onely a few old men and unhappy survive, who fate among the ashes of the Temple, and a few women whom the enemies reserved to satisfie their filthy lust. And will any amongst us, considering all these things, desire to behold the light of the Sunne, although he could live without molestation? Who is such an enemy to his native soyle? who is so effeminate or desirous of his life, that doth not grieve to have lived till this time? would God we had beene all in our graves before we had seene that sacred City fired by a hostile hand, before we beheld the holy Temple destroyed by impiety: and seeing that the hope we had to be revenged upon our enemies is now vanished away, and that we are left alone in misery and necessity, let us hasten to die well, and take compassion upon our selves, our wives and children, and that whilest we have time, to compassionate our selves. For both we are borne to dye, and all that are begotten by us, and the strongest men living cannot avoid it: but injury, and bondage, and to see our wives and children abused before our faces, is no necessity proceeding from mans nature, but they onely are forced to endure it, who when they might have died without it, did refuse for feare. We first of all trusting to our strength, rebelled against the Romanes; now lastly they exhorting us to obedience, we denyed: which of them then will not be enraged against us, if they can take us alive? Most miserable shall those young men be, whose strength will endure many torments, and those old men will move compassion whose aged years cannot suffer tortures; one shall see his wife carried away from him, and another his sonne having his hands bound behinde him, cry out unto his father for help: who now whilest they are free from the thraldome of their enemies, may gloriously assist us with their swords. Let us with our wives and children die free men, let us altogether depart out of this life. This our religion commandeth, this our wives and children perswadeth; God himself hath driven us unto this necessity for this purpose. The Romanes would have it otherwise, who feare lest any of us should perish, and not fall into their hands alive. Let us therefore hasten, that in stead of their expected hope, whereby they verily perswaded themselves to take us alive, we may contrary to their expectation daunt them with a sudden admiration of our glorious deaths.

Whilest Eleazar was yet speaking, and desirous still to continue his exhortation, they all interrupted him: everie one now in a furie bent to follow his advice, made haste to effect it, and as though they had been urged by some spirit thereunto, every one laboured to prevent one another in the execution thereof, judging him to shew most valour and fortitude, that first dispatched himself. They were also desirous to kill their wives and children with themselves. And which is most strange, their mindes were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody worke; but with the same resolution they had, when they heard Eleazars speech, every one retained his good affection towards his friends: yet permitting reason to take no place, and perswading themselves that thus they had well provided for their children, they all at once embraced their wives and children for their last farewell, and tooke their leaves of them, kissing them with teares, and then at once slew them, as though it had been done by the hands of other men, and not their owne, comforting themselves being forced so to do, in that hereby they should escape the tyranny and cruelty of their enemies. Finally, no man was so cowardly, who durst not presume to this action; so every one of them killed his dearest friends. O miserable people, whom necessity forced to slay their wives and children, accounting the action thereof to be the very least of all their miseries! Wherefore now not enduring the griefe that ensued upon this fact, and thinking that in living any while

A while after them, they should injure them whom they had slaine, they with all speed possible gathered all their riches together and set them on fire: which done, they elected ten by lot, who should slay the rest, every one prostrating himselfe upon his wife and children, and embracing them in his armes, and was so slaine willingly by them that executed that wretched office: who having without feare dispatched them, they cast lots whose fortune it was to kill all the rest, and he upon whom the lot should fall, should kill the other nine, and lastly himselfe upon them all, every one so encouraging one another, that there was no difference betweene them that were to be killed, and them that were to kill, and so the rest offered themselves to death: which done, one who was the last of all, being yet alive, went amongst the dead bodies, and searched to see if none lived that needed his hand in so great a multitude of slain people, and finding all of them dispatched, he went and fired the Palace: which done, B he with all his force thrust his sword into his own body up to the hilts, and so fell down by his dearest friends.

The year of the world, 4018. after the birth of Christ, 76. The Jews gathered all their goods together, and cast them into the fire. Ten chosen by lot to kill the rest of the Jews.

In this maner they died, thinking they had left no one alive to have fallen into the Romanes hands, but one certaine old woman, and another that was Eleazar's cousin, who in learning and wisdom surpassed all other women, and five children, who all hid themselves in a cave wherein water was reserved to drink, whilest the rest were busied in this massacre, who were in number nine hundred and sixtie, beside women and children. This calamitie happened the fifteenth day of April. In the morning the Romanes expecting that the Jews would fight with them, made bridges from their mounts unto the walls, and so assaulted the walls: and seeing none of their enemies appeare, but all the walls wasted and on fire, and deep silence in every place, they could not conjecture what was done, and at last they made a cry at once, as though they had been beating the wals with a Ram, thetoby to see if they could make any enemies come out. The women in the vaults heard this cry; and coming forth, declared unto the Romanes all that had hapned, one of them relating unto them the event of all the whole matter: yet for all this the Romanes did not easily beleieve the words, by reason of the greatnesse of that fact, but they endeavoured to quench the fire, and passing thorow it they presently came into the Palace, where they beheld all the dead bodies, yet they did not insult over them as their enemies, but admired that so many should be so obstinately minded to despise death.

The Romanes expect the fight. The Jews hid themselves in a cave.

The Romanes admire the Jews fortitude and obstinate contempt of death.

Of the death of the Sicarians that were fled unto Alexandria and Thebes.

THe Castle being thus taken, the Generall of the Romanes leaving a garrison there, went unto Casarea, for there was no one enemy left in all that country, but now all Judaea was destroyed through continuance of long warres, and many of that Nation though farre distant from it, tasted of those troubles: for it so fell out, that afterward many Jews perished in Egypt at Alexandria: for those Sicarians who had escaped thither, were not content to be safe and free from danger, but there also they attempted alteration, and to defend their libertie against the Romanes, esteeming themselves nothing inferiour unto them, and that onely God was their Lord. And some of the nobler race of the Jews, seeking to withstand that their enterprize, were by these Sicarians slaine: which was no sooner done, but they exhorted the people to revolt. The chiefe and elders of the Jews seeing this, and that they could not repress them without danger, they assembled all the Jews together, and declared unto them the temerity of these Sicarians, shewing them to be the authors of all the miserie that had befallen the Jews, and that now notwithstanding they were escaped, yet they were not certaine of their lives; for that if they were knowne, the Romanes would presently put them to death, and draw them also into the like miserie, who were not partakers of their wickednesse. Wherefore they admonished the multitude to beware lest they drew themselves into the same danger, wherein they were, and to make satisfaction unto the Romanes for themselves, by delivering such people unto them. The Jews were perswaded by these speeches: and foreseeing the danger that might ensue, they furiously assaulted the Sicarians, and took of them 600, and shortly after those who there escaping, fled into Egypt and Thebes,

He boldnesse of the Sicarians, like some infectious disease, infected also the towns about Cyrene. For one Iohn, a Weaver, and a wicked man having escaped, perswaded many simple people to follow him, and led them into the wilderness, promising to shew them signes and visions, and thus he deceived the simplest sort of the Jews: but the noblest of them of Cyrene understanding his deceit, gave Casullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then Governour of Lybia, who sending horsemen and footmen, did easily surprize them being unarmed, and the most part of them were slain, yet some were taken alive, and brought to Casullus. But their leader Jonathan at that time escaped: yet being diligently laid and sought for over all those countries, he was at last taken, and being brought unto Casullus, he sought to delay his own punishment, in offering an occasion of iniquitie unto Casullus. For he accused the richest among the Jews, to have been his advisers to do this matter. Casullus was glad of those allegations, and exaggerated his accusations very much with tragicall termes, so that he seemed to have made an end of the warres against the Jews, and which was worst of all, to be content to credit whatsoever was maliciously spoken: he himselfe instructed the Sicarians to frame scandalous accusations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Jew, whom he had long hated, and his wife Bernice, he put them first of all to death, and after them all that were well moneyed, who amounted to the number of 3000. and this he thought he did without controule, because he confiscated their possessions unto Caesar. And lest any Jew living in any other place should complain of his injustice, he extended his malicious lies against others further off, and perswaded Jonathan and certain others that were taken with him, to accuse the most trusty and faithfull Jews at Rome and Alexandria: one of them who were thus falsely accused, was named Ioseph, who writ this History. But this device of Casullus had not successe as he hoped: for he came to Rome, and brought Jonathan and the rest bound with him, thinking that no more inquiry would be made of the false accusations invented by himselfe.

But Vespasian, suspecting the matter, made diligent inquiry to know the truth: and finding these crimes injuriously imposed upon those men, at Titus intreaty, he acquitted them, and punished Jonathan according to his desert; who being first whipped, was afterward burned alive. And Casullus at that time, by reason of the mildnesse of the Emperour, had nothing said unto him: but not long after he fell into a grievous disease, and was cruelly tormented, not onely in body, but also in minde. For he was greatly terrified, and still imagined to see the ghosts of them whom he had so unjustly slain, ready to kill him; so that he cried out, and not able to contain himselfe, leapt out of his bed, as though he had been tortured with torments and fire. And this disease daily increasing on, his guts and bowels rotting and issuing out of him, at last he died in this manner, leaving behinde him an evident argument, that the Divine Justice doth punish impious malefactors. And this is the end of the History, which we promised to be set down with all fidelitie, for them that are desirous to know the event of the warres between the Jews and the Romanes. And as for our style, we leave it to the judgement of the Reader: but touching the verity of the History, it is such, as no man need to doubt of; for I do affirme that to be the onely scope, which I aymed at in this whole work.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF
OF MATTHIAS, WRITTEN AGAINST
QVITIE OF THE IEWS.

I Suppose (O thou worthiest amongst worthy men, Epaphroditus) that I have sufficiently testified unto them, who shall read those books which I have written, as touching the Authentique History of the Jews, that our Nation is most ancient, and that they have had their originall from themselves, and have from the first beginning inhabited that countrey, whereof they are now possessed at this present. To which effect I have gathered out of our sacred writings, and publisht in the Greek tongue, a History containing the occurrences of five thousand yeers. And for that I see there are divers, who (being too much addicted and seduced by the scandalous blasphemies and reports which some of those who are lewdly affected towards us, have published against us) have misconceited and misbeleaved that which I have written of our Antiquitie, and labour to approve our Nation to be modern, because none of the most ancient and most renowned Historiographers among the Grecians have thought our ancestors worthy to be enrowlled in their writings: I have for these causes held it a part of my duty to write some short Treatise hereupon, both to reprove the evill intent and affected lying of those our calumpners, as also to correct their ignorance, by teaching those who are desirous to know the truth, what the originall of our nation is. For prooffe whereof, I will produce no other testimony then those, who from antiquitie have been judged worthy of credit among the Greeks, laying open before their eyes, that they, who have slanderously & falsely written against us, are convicted by their own mouths: I will also enforce my self to expresse the causes, why very few Grecians have made mention of us in their Histories: and moreover, I will make it known to those who are ignorant (either in effect or in pretence) who they have been that omitted not our History. First of all therefore, I do not a little marvel at those, who (in respect of antiquity) suppose that the truth ought onely to be gathered from the Greeks: and that they justly may claime the honor and knowledge of faithful writing, whereas they neither vouchsafe either us, or any others, the credit or truth in that we set down, although I am able to prove, that all things have falne out quite contrary. For which cause it becometh us not to look to mens various opinions, but to examine that which is right, and gather the same by the effects. For whatsoever is set down by the Greeks is new, and of late memory, and hath been brought to execution, in a manner but yesterday: I mean the foundations of Cities, the inventions of Arts, and the descriptions of Lawes, and the latest practice among them hath bene, and is, the diligent travell in History.

But amongst the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phoenicians (for I presume not to compare my countrymen with them) as they themselves confesse, the memory of their writings is most ancient and infallible. For all these nations dwell in such countries as are not subject to the corruption of aire; and have carefully provided, that none of those things that have been done by them should sleep in obscuritie, but should be kept in memory in the publike writings

The History of the Antiquitie containeth the events of five thousand yeers.

The causes that moved him to write this book.

All things among the Greeks are modern, but such things as were done among the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phoenicians, are of happy memory and venerable antiquity.

- A writings of the learnedst men: whereas innumerable corruptions have crept in among the Greeks, by which the memory of things so repassed, is defaced. But they alwaies who have established new estates, have each of them supposed in their own behalfe, that whosoever was of theirs, he was the first of the world. Yet notwithstanding they have had the knowledge of the nature of letters very late, and have attained the same with very great difficulty. For they that speak of the most ancient use of the same, do boast and glorifie themselves, that they have received the knowledge thereof from the Phœnicians, and Cadmus. Yet notwithstanding, there is not any one of them that can shew any record of that time, either in their Temple, or in their publike registers: whereas, after there arose a great doubt and question, whether those letters were in use during their time, who since have for the space of many yeers continued the siege before Troy. And in sooth, their opinion who affirme that they were ignorant of the use of those letters, which are at this present allowed and accustomed among us, is not to be refused. For it is most manifest, that there is not any writing extant among the Greeks that is more ancient then Homers poesie, which as it is most manifest, hath been in allowance and continuance since the time of the siege of Troy: and yet it is reported, that he left no part of that his poesie in writing, which was composed of divers songs, and onely sung by roat; by which means it came to passe, that there are so many contradictions in the same. And as touching those who have undertaken to write histories among them, I mean Cadmus the Milesian, and Acusilau the Argive, and after him if there were any others; they were not alive, but very little time before the passage of the Persians into Greece. Furthermore, they who among the Greeks were the first that introduced Philosophy, and the knowledge of celestiall and divine things, that is to say, Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, these all of them confesse with one accord, that being instructed by the Egyptians and Chaldees, they have published some few writings, which are supposed to be the most ancient among the Greeks, and it is hardly beleevved also that they were written by them. What reason therefore have the Greeks to be so proud, as if there were none but themselves onely who knew the affairs of antiquitie, and could exactly expresse their truth and veritie? Or who cannot easily conjecture by their own Writers themselves, that their writings were onely upon heresay and supposition, and that their style was onely tyed to their vaine conjectures? Hence cometh it to passe, that in their books they cavill and reprove one another, and make no conscience to maintain and write contradictions in one and the same thing.
- D But it may be said, that I taske my self to a fruitlesse labour, if I should go about to informe those who are better experienced then my selfe: in how many points Hellanicus differeth from Acusilau as touching the Genealogy: in how many places Acusilau hath corrected Herodotus; or how Ephorus hath approved that Hellanicus was a lyer in the greater part of that which he reciteth. Ephorus hath been reprovved by Timæus; and in generall, all they have taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timæus vouchsafed to accord with Antiochus, or Philistus, or Callias, in the Histories of Sicily. Neither have they who have written the Histories of Athens, or those who have entreated of the Argoliques, followed others. What need I reckon up those who in particular have entreated of cities, or of succinct and short matters? whereas in the description of the Persian war, and those exploits that were performed therein, those of greatest authoritie are most at oddes. Thucydides is accused by some for a lyer in divers places, notwithstanding that he seemeth to have described the History of his time most exactly. But the causes of this discord are divers, and it may be that they who shall narrowly pry into them, shall finde more. For mine own part, those two which I shall here set down, in my opinion are of greatest waight. The first, and in my judgement the chiefe, is, that amongst the Greeks, from the beginning they have not been industrious to keep publike Registers of such matters as happened in any time or place: which hath made them erre, and given those a priviledge to lye, who afterwards would look to write any thing of such matters as were acted long since. Neither are the other Greeks onely to be touched with this negligence for not making account of such Registers, but amongst the Athenians also (who are reputed to be glorious for the antiquitie of their countrey, and who are exercised in Sciences) there is no mention of them. For it is said, that the most ancient and publike writing which they have, are those capitall laws which were set down by their Lawmaker Dracon, who lived but a little time before Pisistratus tyranny. What need we speak of the Arcades, who vaunt themselves of their antiquities? For they have learned the use of letters with very great difficulty, and some time after this: whereas therefore there was not any writing published before that time which might instruct those that would learn, learn, or reprehend those that published untruths: from thence it is, that so many differences have happened amongst Historiographers. A second cause is, for that they, who addicted themselves to compose Histories, did not busie themselves about the inquisition of the truth (notwithstanding that each of them did ordinarily promise no lesse) but they laboured to expresse how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole study thereon, as the one-ly means whereby they hoped to obtain reputation above the rest. Some of them therefore addicted their styles to fables, other some by flattering praises thought to curry favour with Kings and Cities. The rest enforced their studies to accusations, by obrecting the work of the writer thereof, under trust to get the more credit thereby. In effect they have followed that course in composing their History, that was every way different from the true nature thereof. (For the assured signe of a perfect and true History is, whereas all men accord both in word and writing in setting down the same thing:) and they who have written diversly, made men beleve that they were the truest amongst all the rest. We ought therefore to grant the superioritie to the Grecians in all that which concerneth eloquence, and the ornament of language, but not in that which appertaineth to antiquitie or truth of History, and especially when the question is, what each man writ as touching his own Nation.

Seeing therefore that both the Egyptians and Babylonians long time since used all diligence in writing, insomuch as their Priests were hereunto enjoined, who did most curiously intreat of all such points: the same also did the Chaldees amongst the Babylonians, and the Phoenicians also (inhabiting amongst the Greeks) used laws (both concerning private and publike affairs) which, because all men confesse it, I will omit to speak of. I let passe also to recount what care our nation had of this point (no doubt greater then those nations above mentioned had) charging our high Priests and Prophets to execute this office, which custome hath been observed even untill this our age: yea (and if I may presume so farre) will be observed in all succeeding ages, as by the scope of my speech ensuing I will endeavour to make manifest. For our nation did not onely depute this office to the most just men amongst them in the beginning, and unto such as were alwaies ready to appease the heave displeasure & wrath of God kindled against them; but they also provided to preserve the line and descent of Priests from all impuritie, and from being intermingled with others. For no man amongst us can be a Priest, who is not borne of a woman descended from the Priests line; neither in this case is any respect made either of riches or honours: but the partie who claimeth the dignitie of Priesthood, must by many witnesses prove his Genealogy, and that he is descended from Priests. This custome is not onely of force in Jewry, our own coun-trei, but wheresoever else any of our nation inhabit, as in Egypt and Babylon, and in any other place, where continually the Priests in their marriages have this respect, not to marry with any woman that is not of their own line, and they send unto Jerusalem the name and pedigree of the woman whom they have married, and all testimony hereof which they can deduce from her ancestors. Now if warres molest our nation (as often they have) in the time of Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the great, Quintilius Varus, and especially in this our age, then those Priests who survive make new Genealogies; and pedigrees out of our holy writ for the foresaid women, that are not devoured by the fury of warre. For they come unto these women, not fearing the company of strangers amongst whom they live: yea, this is an evident token of the Priests integritie, that every Priest during the revolution of two thousand yeers, are registred together with the names of their fathers, and if any one do erre or falsifie any of the things before-said, he is then interdicted from the Altar, and from exercising any Priestly function. So that in the writings of such men, all things must of necessitie be true, and as they ought to be, for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any dissonance and disagreement is found in their writings. For such things as past in ancient times quite beyond the memory of men, were onely written by our Prophets, who had the knowledge thereof by inspiration from God himselfe: but other things of later time are onely recorded by those who lived in the age, wherein the things they writ of were done. The books amongst us, containing the Histories of all ages, are neither infinite, nor one repugnant to another: for all our Chronicle is contained in 22. books, to which books it is impiety to denie credit.

Five of these books were written by Moses, comprehending Genealogies, and the beginning of mankind, and such notable events as hapned even from the beginning of the world untill his death; which is little lesse then three thousand yeers. After the death of Moses untill the time wherein Artaxerxes lived, who was King of the Persians, and son to Xerxes,
the

A the Prophets of our Nation every one writ the History of his time wherein he lived, so that of these mens writings we have thirteene books: the foure other books, which make up the number already mentioned, are known to contain holy Hymnes dedicated unto God, and wholesome precepts for mans life and conversation. All things, which from Artaxerxes untill our time have hapned, are also set down in writing: yet the books wherein they are registred, do not deserve so much credit as the former of ancient times, for that there was no certain succession of Prophets in this age. Moreover, it is evident, that to the former works we give as great credit as to things we our selves write, and notwithstanding they have been so long written, yet in all that time no man durst presume either to alter or blot out any thing therein contained. For all Jews even from their cradle do beleieve these books to be sacred, holy, and divine, and therefore do give all credit possible unto them, and so would willingly suffer death, rather then to do the contrary. Many captives of our Nation have already been cruelly tormented, and divers waies put to death in open Theaters, onely for that they would not commit any thing either in word or deed against their Laws, nor violate the writings of their forefathers. Now who amongst the Greeks did ever sustaine the like? Nay, they are so farre from doing it, that none can be found among them who would suffer any losse in his goods or fortunes, thereby to preserve all the writings of their Nation from perdition: and the reason hereof is, that every one esteemeth the verity of their Histories to depend upon the will of the Writer. And this they do also of their most ancient Historiographers, and not without cause: for they every day see men of their own times, writing Histories of matters long past before in former ages, wherein neither themselves were present, neither yet vouchsafe they to credit the writings of such as were then eye-witnesses thereof: yea some among them have divulged Histories of such things, as of late befell our Nation, when themselves never have been in the place where such matters past as they did write of were, nor have lived in any neighbour place, where they might have probable report how matters past, but onely making a few centones or broken news, they most impudently arrogate to their patcht stufte, the name of a History.

The Jews and Grecians are compared together.

Some others have written of the warres of the Jews.

Joseph was present in all the warres of the Jews.

I my self have composed a most true History of those wars, and of every particular thing there done, as well I might, having been present in all those affairs. For I was Captain of the Galileans amongst our Nation, so long as any resistance could be made against the Romans: and then it so fell out, that I was taken by the Romanes, and being prisoner unto Titus and Vespasian, they caused me to be an eye-witness of all things that past. First, in bonds and fetters, and afterward freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the siege of Jerusalem. So that nothing could then passe whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Romane army, I committed to writing all things with all possible diligence. My selfe did onely manage all matters disclosed unto the Romanes by such as yeelded themselves, for that I onely did perfectly understand them. Lastly, being at Rome, and having now leisure, all businesse being past, I used the help of some (for the privitie of the Greek tongue) and so I published a History of all that had hapned in the foresaid warres: which History of mine is so true, that I feare not to call Vespasian and Titus Emperours in those warres, to witness for them. I first gave a copy of that book to them, afterwards to many noble Romanes, who also were present in those warres, I sold also many of them to our own Nation, to such as understood the Greek language, amongst whom were Iulius, Archelaus, Herod the honest, and the most worthy King Agrippa, who all doe testifie, that my History containeth nothing but truth: Who would not have been silent, if any thing either for ignorance or flattery I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithstanding all this, some ill-disposed persons endeavour to discredit my History, as though they were disputing pro and contra amongst children in schooles, being sometimes on a sudden to forge a feigned accusation, and otherwise to feigne a slanderous and sudden detraction, never considering that he who promiseth other men a true relation of things past, must either be privie unto them by his own knowledge, as having been present in the affairs, or else have that which he speaketh from other mens mouthes by report of them who know them: both which I have done. For I gathered my other books of Antiquitie out of holy Scripture, being my selfe a Priest, and skilfull in our Law, and the History of our warres I have written, my selfe being an agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witness of the rest, so that nothing was said or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any one excuse them from impudency and malice, who labour against me to prove my relation false? They perhaps alledge, that they have read the commentary containing the Emperours acts, yet for all all this, they were not present in any action, repugnant to that, which my History recounteth.

Two things which Ioseph intendeth.

The Jews
care to bring up their children.
The ancient Jews had no need to traf-fick with the Grecians.

Thus have I (as I thought it necessary) made a digression to shew how they are able to performe their word, who discrediting my History, promise to set down truth in writing. I have also sufficiently (as I think) demonstrated, that the registering of things is more ancient amongst other Nations, then amongst the Greeks. I will now first of all dispute against those, who with all might and maine labour to prove our Nation of no antiquitie, for that (as they say) no Greek Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring forth prooffe and testimonie of the antiquitie hereof out of other Writers, and so I will shew that their tongues are no slander, who seek to discredit our Nation. First therefore, our Nation neither inhabiteth a country bordering upon the Sea, neither are we delighted in Merchandize, nor for this cause wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. But our Cities are situate farre from the Sea in a most fertill soyle, which we till with all industry, and our whole endeavours are how to get food for our children, and to keep our countrey Laws, and how to leave unto our posteritie the knowledge of piety, which work we think all our age ought to be employed in. Beside all this before mentioned, we have a forme of living, different from all other Nations: all which concurring together, we had no need to trafficke with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and the Phoenicians do, who give themselves to bargaining and merchandise onely for the covetousnesse of money. Neither were our ancestors delighted in thefts and robberies, nor did our fathers make warre upon any Nation for desire of larger possessions, notwithstanding our countrey was furnished with many thousands of strong warlike men. Wherefore the Phoenicians sailing unto the Greeks to traffick with them, they were thus made known unto them, and by them the Egyptians, and all other Nations, who sailing upon the Seas, brought merchandise into Greece. The Medes also and Persians were known unto them, after such time as they openly reigned over Asia, and the Persians warred even to the other opposite continent.

The Romans were lately known to the Greeks.
Certain Hi-storographers report Spain to be onely
one Citie.

Moreover, the Greeks knew the Thracians, because they were their neighbours, and the Scythians by sailing to Pontus, and finally all that were disposed to write, knew all the Nations bordering either upon the Eastern and Western Seas; but such as dwelt farre from the Sea and Sea-coast, were long time unknown, as also appears in Europe: for neither Thucydides, nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, maketh any mention of Rome, notwithstanding that so long since it was so mighty, and made so great warrs: yet at last, with much ado the Greeks heard of it. Yea, their most curious Writers, and namely Ephorus, were so ignorant of the Frenchmen and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to be a people onely denominated of one Citie, wherein they inhabited, whereas the whole world now knoweth them to inhabit a vast countrey, and a great part of the Western world. Likewise, the said Greek Writers relate the manners of the foresaid people to be such, as neither are, nor were ever used among them. And the onely cause why they were ignorant of the truth, was the distance of the place, and these Writers would seeme to tell something which others of former time had not spoken of. No marvell therefore though our Nation was unknown, and none of them in their writings made any mention of us, being both so farre from the sea, and living after a different maner.

Arguments to
Jews of more antiquitie then the Greeks.

Manethon an Egyptian Writer.

Put case therefore that I denied the Greeks to be of any antiquitie, and to prove my assertion should conclude their Nation to be modern, for that our Histories made no mention of them, would they not laugh at this reason, and use the testimony of their neighbour Nations to prove their antiquitie? I therefore will do the like, and use the testimony of the Egyptians and Phoenicians, whose Record the Greeks cannot deny. For all Egyptians in generall are our enemies, and among the Phoenicians they especially of Tyre; Which I cannot justly say of the Chaldees, who have been Princes over our Nation, & because of their affinity and alliance with our countrey men, have in their Chronicles made mention of the Jews. Yet when I have proved what I now averre, and refell the slanderous reports against us, I will then also shew who amongst the Greeks spake of us, that so the Greeks may also be deprived of this shift and refuge, to excuse their malicious lies falsely forged against our Nation. And first of all I will begin with the writings of the Egyptians, who, as they well know, do nothing at all favour us. Wherefore Manethon, an Egyptian borne, skilfull in the Greek tongue, as by his works appears (for he writ in Greek) compiling a History of the customes and religion of his forefathers, collected (as himselfe reporteth) out of the Egyptian holy writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus, who being indeed ignorant, did much help the Egyptians. This

Manethon,

A Manethon, in his second book of the Egyptian customes saith thus (I will set down his own words, because I use them as a witnesse.) We have a King (quoth he) named Timaeus, in whose reign God being angry with us, contrary to all expectation, an obscure people taking courage, came from the East, and pitching their tents in our countrey, conquered it by force, no man resisting them, and committing our Princes to bonds, did finally burne our Cities, and destroy the Temples of our gods, and behaved themselves most cruelly against the inhabitants, killing many of them, and making slaves of the rest with their wives and children: finally, they chose a King amongst themselves, who should be then of our countrey, his name was Saltis, who coming to Memphis, made both the higher & lower Province tributaries, leaving garrisons in strong holds, and fortifying those places in the East: Like-B wise, foreseeing that the Assyrians were more mightie then he, and would invade his countrey, he found out in this Province a Citie called Saite fit for his purpose, being situate on the East side of the river Bubastis, which by an ancient divine was called Avaris, he builded up this citie, and compassed it with most huge wals, and placed in it two hundred thousand armed men to keep it. This Saltis came in harvest time, to the intent that he might both pay his souldiers, and be a terrour unto other people, and after he had reigned nineteen years, he died.

After him succeeded another King called Baon, who reigned foure and forty yeers, next to him Aphinas, who reigned thirtie six yeers and seven moneths, then Aphosis, who reigned threescore and one yeers, and then Iandus, who reigned fifty yeers and one moneth, after them all reigned Affis, nine and fourtie yeers and two moneths, and these fixe were the first Kings amongst them, ever destroying and warring upon the Egyptians, and labouring to extinguish their race. This Nation was called Hicfos, which signifieth Kings shepherds: for Hic in the sacred tongue, signifieth a King, and Sos a shepherd or shepherds, according to the common speech, and Hicfos is a compound word. Some say these people were Arabians: but in other copies I finde that Hicfos, is not interpreted kings shepherds, but shepherds that were captives: for Hic, and Hac also when it is pronounced, doth in the Egyptian tongue signifie a captive, and this latter exposition seemeth to me to be the truest, for it is more agreeable with the History. Wherefore Manethon reporteth these foresaid kings and shepherds to have ruled Egypt five hundred and eleven yeers: and after these,
 D the King of Thebes, and the King of the residue of Egypt, uniting their forces together, invaded the said shepherds and held on great and long warres against them, and that the said shepherds were overcome by the King Alisfragumthosis, also that then they lost all Egypt which he had in their power, and that they were shut up in a place called Avaris containing ten thousand acres of ground, which as Manethon reporteth, these shepherds environed round about with a huge wall, to the end that all their whole provision might be fortified, and all the preys which they got, defended. Moreover, that Themosis sonne of the said Alisfragumthosis endeavoured by force to subdue them, and for this cause besieged them with foure hundred and 80000. armed men: and at last despairing to take them by siege, he covenanted with them that they should safely depart out of Egypt whither they would, and E that they upon these conditions together with all their families and goods and cattell, departed out of Egypt into the wildernesse, and so into Syria, being in number two hundred and forty thousand, and that fearing the puissance of the Assyrians, who at that time reigned in Asia, they builded a citie in the countrey now called Judza, which they made so large that it might receive them all, and this citie they called Jerusalem. Further, the said Manethon in another book of the Egyptian affairs saith, that in the holy writings, he findeth the foresaid shepherds called captives, wherein he saith most true. For our ancestors were wont to feed cattell, and so leading a pastorall life, were called shepherds, neither are they unjustly called captives: for our forefather Ioseph told the King of Egypt that he was a captive, and long time after he called his brethren into Egypt by the Kings command, but we will F hereafter examine this point more straightly: I will now cite the testimony of the Egyptians concerning this point, and also relate the words of Manethon touching the time when this befell, who saith as followeth.

After that the nation of shepherds were departed out of Egypt unto Jerusalem, King Themosis who drave them out of the Land, reigned twenty five yeers and foure moneths, and then died: and his sonne Chebron succeeded him, who reigned thirteene yeers, and after him Amenophis twentie yeers and seven moneths, next, his sister Amesses one and twenty yeers and nine moneths, then reigned Mephis twelve yeers and nine moneths, and Mephis muschosis twenty five yeers and ten moneths, Themosis nine yeers and eight moneths, Ameno- G phus thirty yeers and ten moneths, Orus thirty fixe yeers and five moneths, after him his daughter Achemcheres, twelve yeers and one moneth, and the brother of Rathosis nine yeers, Achencheres twelve yeers and five moneths, another Achencheres twelve yeers and three moneths, Armais foure yeers and one moneth, Armesis one yeer and foure moneths, Arme- sesmianus threescore and fixe yeers and two moneths, Amenophis nineteen yeers and fixe moneths. Moreover, that Sethosis having made ready a huge army both of foot and horse, and also a Navy at Sea, left the government of Egypt unto his brother Armais, and permitted unto him all other kingly authoritie, onely forbidding him to weare a Diadem, and to oppresse the Queen, mother to his children, commanding him also to abstain from the rest of the kings concubines. And Sethosis himselfe went to Cyprus and Phoenicia, against the H Assyrians and Medes, and subdued them all, partly by the sword, partly by the feare of his power and greatnesse: and being proud of all this his fortunate successe, he bent himselfe against the Eastern countrey, and destroyed with fire and sword the cities of that place, with whole Provinces: and spending much time in these warres, his brother Armais whom he left in Egypt, did without feare commit all that he forbade him to doe: for he oppressed the Queen violently, and daily lay with the rest of the Kings concubines, and being thereto counsell'd by his friends, he put a Crown upon his head and rebelled against his brother. Also that he who was then chief of the Egyptians holy customes, sent letters unto Sethosis, containing all that had hapned, and how Armais had rebelled against him; who returning to Pelusia, came and enjoyed again his own kingdome which by his name was called Egypt: I for Manethon writeth that this Sethosis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais Danau.

Thus far Manethon: out of whom it is evident by computation of the foresaid times, that our nation was delivered out of Egypt, three hundreth ninety and three yeers before Da- naus, and inhabited this countrey of Judæa so long, before Danau came unto Argos: notwithstanding the inhabitants of Argos boast their Citie is most ancient. Wherefore Man- ethon recounteth two things for us out of the Egyptian letters: first, that we came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their countrey again, and that so long agoe, as it was almost a thousand yeers before the Trojane warres. Touching those things which Ma- nethon professeth himself, not to have gathered out of the writings of the Egyptians, who did write out of certain tales and reports, I will hereafter shew, how they are alleadged without any reason for them. For I will once again leave these, and goe to the testimony of the K Phoenicians, which they writ concerning our Nation. The Tyrians therefore have Chronicles of very great antiquitie, which they have kept with all diligence, concerning that which hath been done among them, and indeed they are worthy of memory. Amongst these records it is written, that King Solomon built a Temple at Jerusalem, a hundreth fourty three yeers and eight moneths, before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they have regi-stred the building of our Temple, for Hircanus king of the Tyrians, was our King Solomons friend, obliged unto him for his fathers sake, who for this cause also of his own liberalitie, gave Solomon a hundreth and twenty talents of gold towards the building of the Temple, and cut down the most goodly wood called Libanus, which he bestowed upon him, to make L the rooffe of the Temple withall: for which bounty, Solomon gave him again many liberall gifts, and among the rest a countrey of Galilee named Zabulon: but Solomons wisdome was the chiefe cause of this Kings friendship towards him. For they sent Problemes one to the other to be answered, and Solomon in his answers appeared most witty, as also he did in many things else, and even untill this day, many of the Epistles sent one unto another, are kepr among the Tyrians. And that I doe not feare the authoritie amongst the Tyrians, I will prove by the testimony of Dius, a man who by common consent hath faithfully written the Phoenician History, wherein he writeth as followeth.

After the death of Abibalus, Hircanus his sonne reigned in his stead, who encreased the number of his Easterne Cities, and enlarged Jerusalem, he also joyned the Temple of Jupiter M Olympius, situate in an Island, unto it, filling up the water with earth, adorned it with golden gifts. After this ascending into Libanus, he cut down the wood to build Temples, and that the King of Jerusalem named Solomon, sent unto him certain riddles to be expounded, and he again the like unto him, covenanting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one anothers riddles, should pay unto the other a summe of money, and that Hircanus confessing he could not expound Solomons riddles, did pay unto him much money: Lastly, that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the said riddles, and writ more unto Solomon, which

A which if Solomon could not interpret, he should pay unto Hircanus a summe of money, and this testimony Dius beareth us concerning the foresaid matter. But I will now recount the words of Menander an Ephesian, who hath registred the acts of all Kings both at home and abroad, endeavouring to make a true Historie out of the writings of every countrey. This man writing of the Tyrian Kings, and coming to Hiramus, he saith thus of him: Abibalus dying, there succeeded in the kingdome his son Hiramus, who lived 34. yeers: and this king with a rampire conjoynded Eurychorus, and erected there a pillar of gold in Iupiters temple, and went into the woods, and cut down the Cedars of Libanus to make coverings for the temples; of which, pulling down the old, he erected new, and dedicated the temple of Hercules and Astartus: but that to Hercules in the moneth of Peritius, and then the other to Astartus, when he with an army went against the Tyrians, who did not pay him tribute, whom when he had subdued, he returned again.

The testimony of Menander the Ephesian.
The Genealogie of King Hiramus.

At this time lived Abdemonus a servant unto the King, who was wont to expound the parables, which King Solomon of Jerusalem sent unto King Hiramus: now how long it was from this Kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hiramus, his sonne Belestartus, succeeded him, who lived forty and three yeers, and reigned seven: after him his sonne Abdastartus, who lived twenty yeers, and reigned nine; but this King was treacherously slain by the foure sonnes of his nurse, the eldest of whom reigned twelve yeers. Next whom, Astartus the sonne of Belestartus, who lived fifty and foure yeers, and reigned twelve: after him ruled his brother Astartimus, who lived fifty and foure yeers, and reigned nine, then he was slain of his brother Phelletes, who reigned eight moneths, and lived fifty yeers, and was slain by a Priest of Astarta named Iibobalus, who lived threescore and eight, and reigned thirty two yeers: him succeeded his sonne Badezorus, who lived forty five yeers, and reigned six yeers, to him succeeded his sonne Mettinus, who lived thirty two yeers, and reigned nine. After him Pigmalion who lived fifty six yeers, and reigned fourtie; in the seventh yeer of whose reign, his sister Dido builded a Citie in Africa, and named it Carthage: so that from the time of King Hiramus unto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundred fiftie five yeers, and two moneths: and for as much as the Temple of Jerusalem was built in the twelfth yeer of Hiramus his reign, the computation of the time since that yeer untill the building of Carthage is a hundred forty three yeers, and eight moneths. What need we alleadge more, seeing this testimony of the Phoenicians? The truth is now sufficiently made manifest: for our ancestors must needs have come into this countrey we inhabit, before such time as they built a temple in it, as I have also made manifest in my Books of Antiquitie, collected out of our holy Scripture.

I will now speak of that which the Chaldees writ of us in their Histories; which do much agree in all other matters with those of our Nation. And first let Berosus be my witnesse, who was a Chaldean borne, yet a man famous and known unto all that love learning, for he in the Grecian tongue did write Astronomy, and the Chaldees Philosophy. Berosus imitating the most ancient Histories writeth of the Deluge, and how mankind was therein extinguished, and he in all things imitateth Moses. He also speaketh of the Ark wherein our forefather was preserved, and affirmeth that it was carried into the tops of the mountaine in Armenia: after this he profecuteth the Genealogy of all that reigned from Noe, untill Nabulassar King of the Babylonians and Chaldeans. He likewise setteth down how long every one reigned, and in prosecuting the deeds of this King he recounteth how he sent his sonne Nabuchodonosor into Egypt, and to our countrey with great power, who finding them rebels, subdued them and burnt the Temple at Jerusalem, and so departed, carrying with him all our Nation into Babylon: whereupon our Citie was desolate seventy yeers untill the reign of Cyrus King of the Persians. Moreover, he affirmeth that the Babylonian kept Egypt, Syria, Phoenicia, and Arabia, exacting more of his subjects then ever any King of Babylon or Chaldaea had done before his time. And the words of Berosus must needs be to this effect: Nabulassar his father hearing that his substitute in Egypt, Coelosyria, and Phoenicia had rebelled, he himselfe not being able to take such pains, committed these affairs unto his sonne Nabuchodonosor, and gave unto him a part of his army, for that he was in the flower of his age, and sent him against him: and Nabuchodonosor fighting with the said Champion, overthrew him, and subdued the countrey which of old belonged unto them, and at the same time his father Nabulassar fell sick in Babylon, and died, having reigned twenty nine yeers. But Nabuchodonosor long after understanding his fathers death, he dispossessed of Egypt and other Provinces as he thought good, and taking the captives of Judaea, Phoenicia, and the Syrians that lived in Egypt, he committed them to certain of his friends, G to be brought with other carriage and his army to Babylon, and so he himselfe accompanied with a very few, took his journey to Babylon thorow the Defart: and finding that the Chaldees ruled all, and that their Nobilitie reserved the Kingdome for him, he was made King, and commanded houses to be built for the captives that were coming, in the most convenient places of Babylon, and he of the spoile beautified the Temple of Belus and other places most richly, and built a new Citie without the wall of the old: and providing left hereafter the enemies might turn the River and so have accessse unto the Citie, he invironed the inner Citie with three severall walles, and the outmost Citie likewise. The wals whereof were made of brick, but the walles of the inner Citie were of brick and bitumen: this done, he builded most sumptuous gates which might have become Temples: and H moreover, neere unto his fathers Palace he builded another farre greater, and more costly then it was, the pompe whereof it were hard and perhaps redious to expresse. Yet this we will rehearse worth the noting that this so ambitious and above all credit gorgeous Palace was builded in fifteene daies: in it he erected rocks of stone like mountains, beset with all sorts of trees; he also made a famous garden, all supported with pillars, for that his wife being brought up in the countrey of the Medes, desired to have a prospect into the fields and mountains.

This he relateth of the forementioned King, and many things more in his book of the affairs of the Chaldees, wherein he reproveth the Greek writers, who falsly affirme that Semiramis the Assyrian Queen built Babylon, and that they falsely report those wonderfull I works about Babylon, to have been by her made and finished. We must needs think that the Chaldean History is true, seeing it agreeth with that of the Phoenicians, which Berosus writ of the King of Babylon, who subverted both Phoenicia and all Syria: with them also accordeth Philostratus in his History of the siege of Tyria, and Megasthenes also in his fourth book of the affairs of India; where he laboureth to prove, that the said King excelled Hercules in strength and valour, affirming that he subdued the greatest part of Aitrick, and Spain, and that the Temple of Jerusalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and again reedified by Cyrus; and we may prove it out of Berosus, who in his third book saith as followeth: Nabuchodonosor having begun the third wall, fell sick and died, when he had reigned fourtie three yeers, and K his sonne Evelmeradocus succeeded him, who for his iniquity and lustfull living, was trea-cherously slain by his sisters husband, named Niriglossoor, after he had reigned two yeers.
He being dead, the traitor Niriglossoor usurped the Kingdome, and reigned foure yeers, whose sonne then a childe was made King, called by name Laborsardochus, and he reigned nine moneths; who for that he seemed to be of very corrupt manners, was slain by his own friends: after whose death, they who slew him consulting together, did make one Nabonidus a Babylonian, King. At this time the wals of brick and bitumen about the river of Babylon were built. In the eighth yeer of this Kings reign, Cyrus coming with an army out of Persia, conquered all Asia, and came with his forces against Babylon: but the King of Babylon having notice of his coming, levied an army meeting him in the way, and joyned battell with him; but being overcome in the fight, he accompanied with a very few of his men, was L forced to flie into Borsippa. Cyrus now besieged Babylon, and purposed to destroy the outward wals thereof: but by reason that it was too strong and too hard to win, he returned to Borsippa to besiege Nabonidus the King of Babylon who was fled thither. But Nabonidus not abiding the event of warre, yeelded himselfe unto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him, and gave him a Territory in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: so Nabonidus led the rest of his life in that Province. This History agreeth with ours; for in our writings we finde that Nabuchodonosor in the eighteenth yeer of his reign did destroy our Temple, and that it so remained threescore and ten yeers: Also that in the second yeer of King Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laid again, and that it was finished and reedified in the second yeer of King Darius his reign. This done, I will also relate the Histories of the Phoenicians, that M we may abound with prooffe of that we say, for they make a computation of the yeers after this maner: In the reign of King Ishobalus, Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre thirteene yeers, after whom Baal reigned ten yeers, next him Judges were appointed, to wit, they that follow; Ecnibalus the sonne of Balachus judged two moneths, Chelbis the sonne of Abdau ten moneths, Abbarus the high Priest three moneths, Myttomus and Geraftus sonnes of Abdilimas judged six yeers, after whom Balatorus reigned one yeere, and after his death the Tyri-ans called Merbalus from Babylon, and made him King, and he reigned foure yeers: and he then dying, they sent also to Babylon for his brother Iramus, who reigned twenty yeeres, in

A in whose reign Cyrus obtained the Persian Empire, so that this whole time is fiftie foure yeers and three moneths: for Nabuchodonosor began to besiege Tyre in the seventh yeer of his reign, and in the fourteenth yeer of King Iromus his reign Cyrus was made Emperour of Persia.

Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre.

Wherefore both the Chaldees and Tyrian Historiographers agree with us concerning our Temple. So that the antiquitie of our Nation above mentioned is now made manifest, and without all controversie. And that which is already alleadged to this end, may be sufficient for them, who are not upon purpose contradictions. It is therefore requisite (to satisfy them who give no credit to the writings of other Nations, and contend that the Grecian Histories onely are to be beleaved) to bring many testimonies from the Greeks themselves, who have as opportunitie served, made mention of our Nation and known it.

The Chaldees and Tyrians agree with the Jews History.

B Pythagoras a Samian borne, both of great antiquitie, and excelling all other Philosophers in holiness towards the gods, is not onely convinced to have known the customes of our Nation, but he did also as it plainly appeareth imitate them in many things. His writings are in no place extant, but divers have recorded many notable things of him, and especially Hermippus a man most diligent in searching of Histories. This Hermippus recounteth in his first book of Pythagoras, that the said Philosopher (having one of his familiar friends named Calliphon dead, who was a Crotonian borne) reported this mans soule to be perpetually with him, and that the said soule commanded him not to passe the place where his asse fell, and that he should abstain from unclean water, and that he should with all diligence

Hermippus writings and testimony of Pythagoras.

C eschew blasphemie: and then it followeth, this he did and said, imitating the opinions of the Jews and Grecians, and applying them to himselfe. For it is certainly reported, that this man gathereth much of his Philosophie out of the Jews laws. Our Nation in times past was well known to divers Cities, so that many of them do now observe our customes, and others esteeme them worth the imitation, as Theophrastus doth witness in his book intituled De legibus: for he saith that the Tyrian laws forbid to sweare by any strange Sacrament, and amongst these strange and forrain Sacraments, he reckoneth the oath called Corban, which oath is used onely amongst the Jews, and in our language signifieth the gift of God. Herodotus of Halicarnassus knew our Nation also, and in a maner maketh mention of it: for speaking of the Colchians, he saith thus in his second book: The Colchians, Egyptians, and Theophrastus Corban the gift of God. Herodotus the Halicarnassian touching the Jews circumcision.

D Ethiopians onely amongst all other Nations did use Circumcision in the beginning: for the Phoenicians and Syrians living in Palestina do confesse themselves to have learned this custome from the Egyptians, and the Syrians living neer unto Thermoodontes, and the river Parthenius, and their neighbours the Macronians, are reported lately to have learned it of the Chelchians: and these are they onely, that use circumcision, and they do like unto the Egyptians, but I am not able to say, whether the Egyptians or Ethiopians learned it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Palestina to use circumcision, and it is manifest that of all that inhabit Palestina, the Jews onely use it, which he knowing writeth so of them. Cherilus also an ancient Poet maketh mention of our Nation, and affirmeth that our countrey men warred under Xerxes against the Greeks, and numbring them of the Cherilus an ancient Poet his testimony of the Jews.

E countries that followed him, he lastly spake thus of our Nation:

*A people strange followed this royall throng.
Their language was th' unknown Phœnician tongue: In th' hills of Solymus their dwelling was, Neer to a lake for greatnesse which did passe:
Their heads were shav'd, and for the heads astire,

It is evident as I think that he speaketh of the Jews: for the mountains of Solymus are in our countrey, and that lake also called Asphaltites, which is the greatest and vastest of all lakes that are in Syria, and thus Cherilus maketh mention of us. And that the Jews were not known onely of the Greeks, but also admired of them, it is easie to prove not our of the obscurest writers, but by the testimony of their wisest Philosophers: For Clearchus disciple unto Aristotle, and the best amongst all the Peripateticks in his first Book De somno, saith, that his master Aristotle spake thus of a certain Jew, and reporting Aristotles words, he saith thus: It were too tedious to recount all things else which he alleadgeth, but I will set down that onely that may cause the man to be admired. Hyperochides answered that they were all very desirous to heare it: then quoth Clearchus, according to Aristotles precepts in his Rhetorick torick I will first recount of what nation the man was, lest I seem to oppose my selfe to him, G that set down the foresaid precept. Do so quoth Hyperochides, if so you please. Then he said, This man before mentioned was by nation a Jew (borne in Coelosyria) one of the sect of the Indian Philosophers, and they are called (as I heare reported) among the Indians, Calani, and among the Syrians, Jews, taking their name from the place where they inhabit, called Jury, the name of their City is hard to pronounce, for they call it Jerusalem. This man entertained many strangers, and he came from out of the higher countrey down unto the sea-coast, and he was very eloquent and of great courage. We at that time lived in Asia, when this divine man came unto the place where we were, and began to conferre with us, and with other Philosophers, making triall of their knowledge: and for that many learned men were assembled about him, he at last for this cause more willingly imparted some of his H knowledge unto them. Thus farre Aristotle in Clearchus, recounting moreover at large the admirable abstinence of the foresaid Jew from meat, and his chastitie: all which they that are desirous to know may reade in Clearchus, for I am loth to write any thing superfluous.

So now it is evident how Clearchus by the way of a digression speaking of another matter, maketh mention of us. But Hecataus Abderita a Philosopher, and one brought up with King Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomaeus of Lagus, did not onely briefly make mention of us, but also writ a whole book of our Nation the Jews, out of which I will briefly note some few points that occurre, but first I will shew of what antiquitie he is. For he recordeth the time when Ptolomaeus neete unto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which hapned the eleventh year after Alexanders death, in the hundred and seventeenth Olympiade, as Cassius writeth: who I speaking of this Olympiade saith, that in this time Ptolomaeus Lagus overcame Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which Demetrius was called Poliocetes, and all men con-fesse that Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiade: so that it is evident that at that time wherein Alexander lived, our Nation flourished. And Hecataus saith, that after that battell fought at Gaza, Ptolomaeus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the clemency of Ptolomaeus, followed him into Egypt, and conversed with him: amongst the which one was called Ezechias the Jews high Priest, a man about threescore and six years old, and of chief notice and dignitie of all his Nation, and most prudent and eloquent, one also who in all affairs had more experience then any K man else. He likewise reporteth that the number of the Jews Priests who receive their tenths, and rule all in generall, is a thousand and five hundredth or thereabout: and againe making mention of the same Ezechias, he saith, This man being in this reputation and honour, and conversing with us, by the help of some about him, declared all things wherein we and this Nation differ, and shewed unto us the place of his dwelling, and the manner of his conversation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecataus sheweth what manner of people we are, and how religious in our laws, and how that we rather will sustain all torments and death it selfe, then violate them in any thing, and that we account it a worthy thing so to do: adding moreover, that being much hated of our neighbours, and having suffered all contumelies both at the hands of the Persian Kings & their officers, yet that we could not be forced to change our opinions, but that we L are continually exercised to give a reason thereof. He also recordeth an example of our constant mindes: for Alexander (quoth he) being at Babylon, and purposing to reedifie the temple of Bell, he commanded all his souldiers to carry timber to the building hereof, and the Jews onely disobeyed his command, for the which they endured many stripes and torments, till such time as the King freed them from it: and they (quoth he) returning to their own countrey, destroyed all the temples and altars that they found there, and some of them were by the officers therefore punished, other escaped free; adding that we may justly be admired for these things, and that our Nation is exceeding populous; likewise that many of us were carried captives into Babylon, and there served the Persians. Moreover, that many more were disperst into Egypt after Alexanders death, for a tumult begun in Syria. He also record- M eth the greatnesse of our countrey, and the fertility thereof; they inhabit (quoth he) a countrey that hath almost thirty hundredth thousand acres of most fertill ground; for Jewry is of this largenesse, and that in times past we inhabited a large and very great City, which was very populous; he speaketh also of the building of our Temple in this maner: The Jews have many other towns and villages in every Prowince, but they have one most strong city, the compasse of whose wals is fiftie foulds, and in it inhabit a hundred and fifty thousand men, and this Citie they called Jerusalem, in the midst thereof is a building of stone with four Porches a hundred cubits about, it hath also double gates wherein is a foure squared Altar

Moreover, he shewed how our Nation warred under Alexanders successors, and he reporteth that which he heard of a certaine Jew in the army, and I will set downe the Authors own words. As I went (saith he) to the red Sea, a certaine Jew, one of the horsemen that conducted us, named Mosellamus, who was a courageous man, and one who excelled all archers else, both Greeks and other Nations; This Jew, (every one hastning on forward of his journey, and being willed by a Southsaier to stand) asked for what cause the multitude staid and went not forward? Presently the Southsaier shewed him a bird which he diligently viewed, and told the Jew, that if that bird did stand still in the place, then it was expedient for them to stand, and if the bird did mount up and flee, that then they ought to march on forward, but if it flew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wisdome to retire. The Jew hereat was silent, yet drawing his Bow, he shot an arrow and killed the bird, whereat the Southsaier and certaine other were offended, and cursed him. But he, taking the unhappy bird in his hand, said unto them: Are ye so mad, as to thinke that this bird, not having the foresight to preserve her self from this death, is able to direct us in the successe of our journey? Had this bird foreknowne future events, she would have eschewed this place, for dread, that Mosellamus a Jew should have stricken her with an arrow. But we will now leave the testimony of Hecataeus: for every one that list may read his book, and there understand this more at large. I will not omit the testimony of Agatharchides, a man of no evil in his own opinion, yet indeed one who hath used detraction to our own Nation. This man speaking of Stratonice, how leaving her husband Demetrius, she came into Syria, and how Selenus would not marry her as she hoped (who having an army at Babylon, warred against Antioch, and had taken the City) and that she fled into Seleucia, whereas she might have made a speedier escape by water, but that she was forewarned in a sleep so to do, and that she was there taken and died, &c. Agatharchides, having used this preface, and inveighed against Stratonices superstition, useth an example of our Nation on this manner: the people that are called Jews, inhabit a most strong city, which they call Jerusalem; these people are wont to rest upon the seventh day, and do neither beare armes, nor till their grounds, nor do any other businesse on that day, but their custome is to remaine in their Temple, and there with stretcheth out armes continue in prayer till night. And so upon a time they persevering in that foolery, whilst they should have defended their City, Ptolomaeus Lagus entered it with many people and a great army: who greatly tyrannized over them, and so they found by experience, that the solemnity appointed by their Law, was prejudiciall unto them: such like Churches as this, did teach them and all Nations else to flee unto dreames, which their law teacheth, never considering that humane policy cannot prevaile against that which must necessarily happen. Agatharchides thought this which he reports of us to be ridiculous: but they that weigh it with indifferency, shall perceive, that it is greater commendation to our Nation, who rather suffer their countrey and our safety to be lost and endamaged, then to violate the Laws of God.

I thinke, I am thus able to shew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our Nation, not for that they knew us not, but for envy. For Jerome, who writ a book of succession, in the same time that Hecataeus lived, who was a friend unto King Antigonus, and being President of Syria, never mentioneth us in all his History, notwithstanding he was brought up almost in our countrey. But Hecataeus writ a book of us, so different are the mindes of men: for one of them thought our Nation worthy to be diligently recorded, the other through malice was hindered from speaking the truth: yet the Histories of the Chaldees, Egyptians and Phoenicians, may suffice to prove our antiquitie, together with the Greeke Writers: for besides those before mentioned, Theophrastus also, Theodoros, Manasse, Arifanes, Hermogenes, Euemeros, Canon, Zopyrius, and many others, no doubt (for I have not perused all mens books) have manifestly testified of us. For many of the foresaid men were blinded with errors, as not having read our holy Scriptures, yet they all joyntly testifie our antiquity, for which I now alleadge them. Truly Demetrius Phalerens, Philon the elder, and Eusebius, did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reason it is they should be borne withall: for they were not so skillfull as to reach our writings with so much curiouse. thus farre, it resteth that I now present one point more, whereof I made mention in the beginning of this book: to wit, that I declare the detractions and slanderous reports of divers, concerning our Nation; to be false and void of truth; and I will use the testimony of those writers, who record, that the lying Historiographers, at such time as they committed to writing the foresaid detractions, did also even against themselves register such like slanders as they did against us. And I doubt not, but that all those who are conversant in Histories can testifie, that the like hath been done by most writers for certaine private hatred, or such like respects. For some of the Gentiles have attempted to deface the honour and reputation of the most renowned Cities, and to defame the manners of their inhabitants. Thus did Theopompus to Athens, and Polycrates to Lacedæmon; and the Author that writ Tripoliticum (for it was not Theopompus as some suppose) used the City Thebes very hardly: and Timæus in his Histories of the foresaid places, doth many times detract both them and others. And this they do, calumniating the most excellent that are, in something or other, some for envy and malice, others, that their fond babbling may make them famous, and so indeed it doth among fooles, that are knowne to have no sound judgement, but wise men will condemne their malice. To be short, this is the cause of so many slanderous reports forged against our Nation: some to gratifie the Egyptians have attempted to deprave the truth, and, so have neither reported the verity concerning our ancestors coming into Egypt, nor touching their departure from thence, and they have had many causes of malice and envy urging them hereto. And chiefly for that our progenitors in their countrey waxed mighty, and so departing to their own countrey, were made happy and fortunate. Secondly, the diversitie of our two Religions made great discord and variance amongst us, our Religion so farre excelling theirs in piety, as the divine essence of GOD excelleth unreasonable creatures (for they commonly worship such brute beasts for Gods, and every one worshippeth divers kindes;) vain and foolish men, who from the beginning have been accustomed to such for-tish opinions, as would not permit them to imitate us in our divine Religion, and conformable to reason: and yet seeing many favour and follow our Religion, they were hereby incited to such hatred, that to derogate from us, they feared not to falsifie their own ancient records, not considering that in so doing they were led through a blind passion, to write against themselves. Moreover, I will prove all I have spoken, to be true, by one mans words, whom a little before (being a famous Historiographer) we have produced as a witnesse of our antiquitie.

Manethon therefore, who confesseth himself to have gathered the Egyptian History out of their holy writings, having by way of a Preface recounted how our predecessors came into Egypt with many thousands, and there conquered the inhabitants, he afterward confesseth that losing all their possessions in Egypt, they got the countrey which is now called Jewry; and in it builded a Citie named Jerusalem, and a Temple; and thus farre he imiteth ancient Writers. And then usurping to himself authority to lie, protesting that he will insert into his History certaine reports divulged amongst the common people, he reports things of the Jews altogether incredible, intending to mixe with our Nation the lepers of the Egyptians, and other sicke people of other countries, who (as he saith) being abominable to the Egyptians, made an escape from thence; affirming also that they had a King named Amenophis, which is a fained name, and therefore he durst not presume to speak determinately of the time of his reigne: whereas he speaketh exactly of the reigne of all other Kings.
Hereupon also he addes certaine fables, forgettring himself that he reported the shepherds departure out of Egypt to Jerusalem, to have been almost five hundred and eighteen yeers before his time: for King Themusis reigned when they departed out of Egypt; from whom the time that other Kings did reigne, untill the two brethren, Sethon and Hermes, accomplished the terme of three hundred fourescore and thirteene yeers. He also saith, that the eldest of these two, Sethon, was called Egyptus, and the other Hermes, was called Danau, whom his brother Sethon expelled, and afterward reigned fifty nine yeers; and after him Rampses, his eldest sonne, reigned threescore and six yeers. Having therefore confessed, our ancestors to have departed out of Egypt so many yeers before, now lastly he addeth, that Amenophis was their King, who was a contemplator of the Gods, as Orus their King before him was, and that one Amenophis a Priest, the sonne of Papius, did in all things most excellently accomplish his desire: which Priest seemed to participate of some divine nature, for he excelled in wisdom, and could foretell things to come, and that he gave the King his surname, that he might also see the gods, if so be he would endeavour to cleanse the countrey from lepers, and other uncleane people. Whereat the King rejoycing gathered together all the

A the impotent people of his land, amounting to the number of 80000. and sent them, and other Egyptians appointed to this worke, in the East part of Nilus, there to hew and square stones. And that amongst them there were also certaine learned Priests infected with leprosie; also that this divine Priest, Amenophis, greatly feared, lest the indignation of the Gods would fall upon the King and himself (who had perswaded and counselled the King to do violence to the foresaid lepers) likewise that he said that because he used the help of unclean persons, they should obtaine dominion over Egypt for thirteen yeers; yet durst he not presume to signifie this to the King, but he kild himself, leaving this written in a booke, where men might finde it: and the King, having notice hereof, fell into great sorrow and heaviness. This done, he speaks as followeth: So the King, being requested for their quietnesse and defence to assigne them a city to inhabit, appointed unto them a desolate place called Avaris, which had been the shepherds city (this city the ancient Divines call Triphonis) but they, having got the possession of this place fit for rebellion, made choice of one of the Priests of Heliopolis to be their Captain, whose name was Osarsiphus, and bound themselves with an oath to obey him in all things: and he presently made a law, that they should neither worship the Gods of the Egyptians, nor that they should abstaine from those beasts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they should marry with none but such as they judged to be their friends.

Osarsiphus, Captaine of Avaris.

Having ordained this and many things else contrary to the Egyptians religion, he commanded them with great labour to environ their city with a wall, and to make preparation to war against King Amenophis: and he himself making choice of some Priests, and a few other unclean persons, sent to Jerusalem to the shepherds which were driven out of Egypt by King Themusis, declaring unto them their own and their fellowes injuries, and requested them to levie an army to fight with them against Egypt, promising them free entrance into Avaris, the countrey where their fore-fathers inhabited, and that he would furnish them with all necessities, telling them that they should now fight in so happy a time, as that without all doubt they might conquer the countrey. The shepherds hereat rejoycing, all of them armed themselves, to the number of two hundred thousand, and leaving their city, they came to Avaris. But Amenophis, King of Egypt, hearing of their invasion, and remembering what Amenophis, the son of the Priest Papius, had left in writing was in great feare, and presently assembling

D together the people of Egypt and consulting with the Princes of his countrey, he sent all holy beasts, and all that the Priests esteemed, before him, giving the Priests especiall charge to hide their idols: and he commended his sonne Sethones (who also by his father Rampses was called Rhameffes) being but five yeers old, unto the custody of a friend of his: and then accompanied with three hundred fighting men, he met his enemies, but would not fight with them, fearing lest he should fight against the pleasure of the Gods; and so he retired himself to Memphis: and taking Apis and the rest of the Egyptian Gods, he, with all his troups of Egyptians, took ship, and fled into Ethiopia. For the King of Ethiopia upon courtesie obeyed him, and for this cause he entertained him and his followers, and provided all necessities for them, for that fatall thirteene yeers banishment, and this was done in Ethiopia. In the meane time, the inhabitants of Jerusalem came down into the countrey with the unclean Egyptians, and did so tyrannize over the inhabitants, that all their beholders judged their victory to be full of cruelty: for not content to fire the cities and townes, and to commit all maner of sacriledge, and to destroy the Idols of the Gods, they did also most cruelly teare in pieces the sacred Beasts, and forced the Priests and Prophets to lay violent hands upon them, and kill them: after which deed they drave them out of the countrey naked. It is therefore reported, that a Heliopolitan Priest, Osarsiphus by name, made lawes for them, and statutes to governe them. This Priest was called Osarsiphus, taking his name from the God of Heliopolis, called Osiris, who being now thus conversant with this people, changed his name, and called himself Moses.

F Thus the Egyptians report of the Jews, and many things else, which for brevity sake I omit. Manethon furthermore writeth, that afterward Amenophis the King came with a great power out of Ethiopia, and his son Rampses with him accompanied with a great army; and that joyning battell with the shepherds and polluted persons, he gave them an overthrow, and pursued them unto the borders of Syria. And this is Manethons report: but for as much as he writeth old wives tales, dotages and lies, I will by manifest reason convince him; first, distinguishing that whereof I am to speak hereafter. He of his own accord granteth and confesseth, that our ancestors at first were not Egyptians, but strangers that came thither from another place, and conquered the countrey, and againe departed from thence. I will now out of his own writings endeavour to shew, that the weak people of Ægypt were not mixed G with us, and that Moses, who indeed was our conductor out of Ægypt, and lived many ages before, was no leper. He therefore first of all setteth down a ridiculous cause of this fore-mentioned faction, which was, that King Amenophis was desirous to see the Gods. Which Gods trow yee? he could already see the Oxe, the Goat, the Crocodile and the Munky, but the God of heaven how could he see? And why had Amenophis this desire? Forsooth, because a certaine King one of his predecessors had seen them; he therefore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the sight of them, needed no new device to accomplish his desire: but perhaps the foresaid prophet was a man of great wisdom, by whom the King had confidence to attaine his desire: but if so he had been, how chanceth it that he was so unwise he could not perceive, that it was an impossible thing to satisfie the Kings de- H fire? for that which he promised was not brought to passe. Or what reason moved him to thinke that the Gods were invisible, because of lepers and weake people? The Gods are offended with mens impieties, not with the defects of their bodies. And how was it possible that at one instant so many thousand lepers and infirme persons should be gathered together? or wherein did not the king obey the Prophet? He commanded that the lepers and infirme persons should be exiled the countrey, and the king did not banish them the countrey, but sent them to hew stones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purposed to cleanse the countrey from lepers. Lastly, he saith, that the Prophet foreseeing that Ægypt was to suffer, and fearing the wrath of the gods, killed himself, and left his minde in a book written unto the king. How chanced it then that the Prophet did not at first foresee his own I death, and so oppose himself to the kings desire to see the gods? or wherefore did he feare such calamities as were not to fall in his life? or what great misery hanged over his head, which might worthily cause him to kill himself to prevent it? But let us heare that which followeth, more sottish then all the rest.

words repeated.

The King (quoth he) hearing this, and stricken with feare, did not for all this expell those lepers he ought to have exiled, but at their request gave them (as he saith) a City, wherein before-time the Shepherds did inhabite, called Avaris; whereinto they being come, they made a Priest of Heliopolis their Prince, who devised laws for them: commanding them neither to adore the Gods, nor to abstaine from offering violence to such beasts as amongst the Ægyptians are sacred, but that they should kill and spoile all things, that they should K marry with none but such as were their confederates, that he bound the people with an oath to keep those lawes, and that they fortified Avaris to fight against the King. Adding moreover, that he sent to Jerusalem for help, promising to yeeld Avaris unto them, being a place sometime possessed by their ancestors, and that they from that place leading their forces, might easily subdue all Ægypt: he then saith, that the Ægyptian king, Amenophis, came against them with 300000. and yet for that he would not strive against the decree of the Gods, he fled into Æthiopia, and carried with him Apis and other holy beasts, and that the inhabitants of Jerusalem coming downe invaded the land, fired the Townes and Cities, slew their Nobles, used all sorts of cruelty possible, and that the Priests name, who made lawes and statutes for them to live under, was one of Heliopolis, Osarsiphus by name, deriving the L same from Osiris, the god of Heliopolis: and that this man, changing his name, was afterward called Moses.

Moreover, that Amenophis, having lived in banishment thirty yeers, came with a strong power out of Æthiopia; and fighting with the shepherds and polluted, he slew many of them, and put the rest to flight, pursuing them unto the borders of Syria. Manethon remembreth not, that here again he telleth a very unskillfull tale: for although the lepers & impotent persons were offended with the King, for appointing them to hew stones, yet it is to be thought, that they receiving their own desire at the Kings hands, to wit, a City to dwell in, that now they againe became the Kings well-willers. Supposing also their hatred still continued towards him, they rather should have attempted revenge by treason against him, then towards M all their nation, wherein they had many deare friends and alliance. And although they had purposed to warre against these men, yet would they not have been so impious as to have rebelled against the Gods, and to have violated the laws wherein they were brought up.

A confutation of Manethons words allad-ged.

We have therefore cause to thank Manethon, in that he cleareth us, and affirmeth his own countrey men (yea a Priest) to be authors of this impiety, and that by oath they bound themselves so to do. But is it not against all reason, that neither any of their countrey men nor kinsmen rebelled with them, but that the poore distressed people were glad to send to Jerusa- lem

- A lem for succour? But what society of friendship had they with the people of Jerusalem, of whom they came to demand help? Why? they were more their enemies then the rest of their countrey men, and were all of quite different manners from us. They of Jerusalem (as he saith) presently did as they were willed to do, in hope that, according as they were promised, they might subdue Egypt. Were they ignorant of that countrey out of which they had been driven by force? had they lived in poverty or misery, perhaps they might have been induced to have done it: but seeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich city, and possessed a goodly fertill soile farre better then Egypt, what might move them thereto? What reason had they, at the request of their ancient enemies (and they also so diseased, as they of Jerusalem could not abide their own friends among them that had the like diseases) to thrust themselves into danger? they could not fore-know the kings intent to flee; as for Manethon himself saith, he met them at Pelusia with 300000. men. And this they that went to warre well knew. But what reason had they to conjecture that the kings minde would change, and he flee? Then he saith, the army of Jerusalem getting the granaries of Egypt into their hands, did much harme: and this he upbraideth them withall, as who should say, they were not requested to come as enemies? or as though these matters be to be cast in souldiers teeth that are strangers and sent for from out of another countrey; when as the Egyptians themselves before their coming had done the like, and bound themselves with an oath to performe the same. But short time after, Amenophis fought with his enemies, and got the victory of them, and put them to flight, and pursued them unto the borders of Syria. As though
- C that Egypt were a countrey so easily to be won by any man, that at any place or part thereof invadeth it? and that the souldiers of Jerusalem, having now by the laws of armes possessed that, and knowing Amenophis to be yet alive, would not have fortified that part of the countrey, whereby he might have invaded them, having all opportunity to do it? or at least they would have gotten more help from one place or another. Amenophis, as he saith, pursued them even unto Syria, thorow the sandy and dry places: as though it were easie for an army that had nothing else to do, but to march on forward, to passe leasurely thorow them. To conclude therefore, our nation neither came of the Egyptians, as Manethon confesseth, neither was mingled with the diseased of that countrey: for it is probable, that many of those sick people perished in the stone works, many in the great fight and battel, and the rest of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I refute that which he speaks of Moses.

The Epilogue
that the Jews came not of the Egyptians

- The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a divine person, and one to be admired, but they commit great impiety in labouring to challenge him for their countreyman, saying that he was a Priest of Heliopolis, banished with the rest for leprosie. For he is recorded to have lived five hundreth and eightene years before this time, and to have guided our ancestors out of Egypt, into that countrey wherein we now inhabit; and his own words testifie his body to have been cleane from that disease of leprosie: for he commandeth all lepers to be expelled out of the townes and villages, and to live apart by themselves, also to be clothed in some torne garment, and that whosoever toucheth them, or cometh under the same roofo with them, is to be accounted an uncleane person. And if so be a leper happen to be
- E cured of that disease, he appointed certaine purifications, cleansings, and baths of fortunate waters, and all his haire should be shaved off, and that then after many and sundry sacrifices, he should be admitted into the holy city. But contrariwise, had he been urged with that misfortune and calamity himself, he would surely have been more provident, and more mercifull to such as should have been afflicted with that disease.

An answer to Manethons
slanders touching Moses.

Moses was not a leper.

- He did not onely make these severe laws against lepers, but he also interdicted all that wanted any joynt or parcell of the body, from being Priests, or exercising any office at the Altar: yea he also appointed, that if any Priest should have any of these defects betide him after he was a Priest, that then he should be deprived of the dignity. How can it then be probable, that to his own prejudice and discredit he would have enacted such laws? Also the changing of his name is incredible: for he was called (as he saith) Osarsiph, which nothing agreeth with the transmutation of his name, but his true name betokeneth that Moses was saved from the water. For, Moy in the Egyptian tongue signifieth water. But I have now sufficiently, as I thinke, declared how Manethon, whilest he followed the ancient writers did not much erre, but when he fell to old wives tales, he then either absurdly fained them of his own head, or else for hatred he bare to our nation, beleeveth them. I now thinke it not amisse to examine a little the words of Charemon, who professing himself to write the Egyptian History, maketh mention of the same king Amenophis his sonne Rhameffes, as Manethon doth, and he reporteth that Isis appeared to Amenophis in his sleepe, checking him for that her Temple was destroyed, and that Phiritiphantes, a holy Scribe, told the king, that if he would expell all polluted and unclean persons out of Egypt, that then he should not be any more terrified with these night visions. Moreover, that hereupon making search for all sick and diseased persons, he banisht them out of his land, to the number of 250000. And that their Captaines were called Moses and Ioseph, holy Scribes, also that these Egyptian names were so, that Moses was named Tisithes, and Ioseph, Petsephus: and that they came to Pelusium, where they found 380000. left there by Amenophis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt: also that they all entring into a league together suddenly invaded Egypt, and Amenophis not abiding the brunt fled into Æthiopia, leaving his wife great with childe, who hiding her self in caves and dens, did bring forth a child whom they cald Messenes, who afterward drave the Jews into Syria, being in number 200000. and this done, he recalled his father Amenophis out of Æthiopia. And thus Charemon saith.

Messenes, son of Amenophis.

But I imagine, that which I have already said, to be sufficient to declare the vanity of both these writers. For if that which they report were true, it were impossible that they should so much differ: but they labour to devise lies, and write not any thing agreeable to other mens writings. For Manethon saith, that the cause of the banishment of the lepers was the Kings desire to see the Gods; and Charemon saith, that it was for that Isis after appeared unto him in his sleep. Manethon also saith, that Amenophis gave the king that counsell to cleanse the countrey; and Charemon saith, that he that counselled the king was called Phiritiphantes. The number also of lepers hath very good consonance I warrant you. Manethon saith, they were almost fourscore hundreth. Charemon saith, two hundreth and fifty thousand. Moreover, Manethon writeth how that these lepers were first sent to a place to hew stones, and afterward came to Avaris to dwell, and that they having already begun warres in Egypt, that then they sent for help from Jerusalem. And Charemon saith, that they having left Egypt found at Pelusium two hundreth and fourscore thousand men, whom Amenophis had kept there, with whom they joyning againe, returned and invaded Egypt, and then Amenophis fled into Æthiopia: and which is worth the noting, he setteth not down what countrey men, or to what purpose this great army was, whether Egyptians or strangers, neither doth he shew any reason why the king would not carry them into Egypt. Moreover, Charemon saith a dreame of the lepers and Isis, and reporteth that Ioseph together with Moses was expelled, whereas Ioseph lived foure ages before Moses, every age containing at least a hundreth and seventy yeers. Ramestes also, Amenophis sonne according to Manethons History, being a young man fled into Æthiopia, and was banished with his father, and afterwards assisted him in the warres: whereas Charemon reporteth that he was borne in a cave after his fathers departure, and that he getting the victory did drive the Jews into Syria, who were in number two thousand. O felicity in lying! for he neither told what nation those three hundred and fourscore thousand were, nor yet how a hundreth and fourscore thousand of them perished, neither were they slaine in the fight, or fled unto Ramestes: and which is most to be admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom he calleth Jews, or whether he attribute this name unto the 250000. lepers, or unto the three hundreth and fourscore thousand which were at Pelusium.

But it is folly to oppose my self against them who have sufficiently contradicted themselves: for had other men controlled their writings, they had been the more to be borne withall. I will adde Lyfimachus unto the two former, who hath the same lie that they have, yet farre more absurde a fiction then theirs. For he saith, that at such time as Bocchoris reigned in Egypt, the people of the Jews being scabbed and infected with leprosie, fled into the Temples to beg maintenance, and that so many men were with this disease infected, that a dearth and scarcity did fall upon Egypt. Likewise that King Bocchoris went unto Ammon to know of the Oracle what caused the dearth, and that answer was made, that if he would expell all lepers and uncleane persons from out of the Temples into the desert, that then the famine would cease, and that he should drowne these lepers, as if the sunne disdain- ned that they should live, and that then he should purifie the Temples, and so the earth would againe yeeld fruit: also that Bocchoris having this answer from the Oracle, he called together the Priests and sacrificers, and having gathered lepers and uncleane people together, he delivered them to souldiers to be conducted into the desert, and that then they should be lapt in lead, and cast into the sea. Moreover, they being drowned, other diseased people were gathered together, and were carried into the wilderness to be destroyed, and that they taking counsell one of another what to do, the night following they made great fires

A fires and lights, wherewith they terrified and drave away the souldiers that kept them, and that they fasted the day following, requesting God to be mercifull unto them, and that the next day, one Moses counsell'd them to go all one way, as thick together as they could, till such time as they came to some place inhabited; and that he then commanded them never hereafter to be friendly to any man; but alwayes rather to give bad counsell then good; and to destroy all Temples, and Altars of the gods they came by: unto which counsell they all agreeing, journeyed together thorow the wilderness, and after much sorrow came to places inhabited; using men by whom they past injuriously, firing Temples and robbing them: at last in this maner, they came unto that place which they now call Judæa; and there building a City, they began to dwell, and of this fact called the City Hierosyla, and shortly after growing more potent, they for avoiding shame, changed the name thereof, and called it Jerusalem, and themselves the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

This fellow found not that King, which the two former speak of, but he joyned a more new name, and leaving the dream and the Prophet, he goeth to Ammon, to know an answer of the old, touching the scabbed and lepers: for he saith, that a multitude was gathered together at the Temples; but he leaveth it uncertain, whether the Jews onely were infected with this disease: for he saith the people of the Jews: which people, whether they were strangers or such as were born in that countrey, why doest thou call them Jews, when they were Egyptians? If they were strangers, why doest thou not tell of whence they were? Or how came it to passe that the King having drowned so many of them in the sea, and left the rest in the wilderness, that still so many should be left? Or how did they passe the wilderness, and get the countrey we now inhabit, and built a City and a Temple famous thorow all parts of the world? Thou shouldest not onely have told the name of our law-maker, but also what countreyman he was, and of what parents, and what moved him in his journey to make such laws against the gods, and against men. For if they were Egyptians, they would not so easily have forgotten the religion wherein they were brought up: or of what place else soever they were, they had some laws or other, which they had been accustomed to keep. If they had vowed to have born no good will unto them by whom they were driven out of their countrey, they had had some just occasion so to do. But to undertake warre against all the world, and deprive themselves from all friendship and help of mortall men, doth not shew their fortitude, but the foolishnesse of him who doth thus belie them. Who most impudently affirmeth, that their City took the name of Church, spoiling, and afterward changed it. For what cause forsooth did they change the name thereof? marry for that the former name was

OF THE ANTIQVITY OF THE IEWS, WRITTEN BY FLAVIVS JOSEPHVS, AGAINST APION OF ALEXANDRIA, AND DEDICATED TO EPAPHRODITVS.

Apion wrote something very coldly.

Thrice Honoured and beloved Epaphroditus, I have in my former bookes so farre forth as I was warranted by truth, both protested and approved the Antiquity of our nation, out of the writings of the Pharisees, Chaldees and Egyptians: and for the further confirmation thereof, I have produced the testimony of divers Greek Authors. Furthermore, I have opposed my self against Manethon and Cheremon, and divers others. At this time likewise I will undertake to contradict all the rest of those writers, that have published anything against us, for in respect of Apion, who pretendeth himself to be learned, I grow halfe suspicious, whether it be a matter answerable to my discretion and judgement, to vouchsafe him any reply at all. For as touching the one part of that which he hath written, it seemeth to be one and the same, with that which the rest have written: and as touching the other, it is very cold and barren. The greater part thereof is filled with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, approving him to be a man both loose in condition, and turbulent in his life. And for as much as divers men are so disurnished of judgement, that they rather suffer themselves to be won by these follies, then to be wearied and wrought by that which is written with better consideration, vainly doating on detractions, and growing discontent to give eare to other mens well deserved praises I have thought it necessary to examine such a mans labours, the rather, for that he hath written against us, as if he intended to accuse us before a Tribunal, and convict us by a publike trial. For I see that it is an ordinary course for the most part of men, to hugge and take hearty pleasure, when as he that beginneth to blame another man, is himself convicted and found guilty of those defaults, which he impureth and objecteth against another.

Apion concerning Moses and the Jews.

Truly it is no easie matter to lay open the ambiguous and doubtfull speeches which Apion useth, neither to understand perfectly what he intendeth to expresse. But like a man that is grievously distracted & confused in his foolish lying, he groweth almost to that point, to recapitulate that, which hath beene heretofore set out, and searcht for, as touching the departure of our forefathers out of Egypt: and afterwards he falleth to accuse the Jews that inhabited Alexandria: and thirdly, he intermixeth his blamefull blasphemies against the ceremonies accustomed in our Temple, and depraveth our laws and ordinances likewise. Now, that our predecessors have not taken their originall out of Egypt: neither have beene driven from thence for any infirmity or deformity of their bodies, or for any wound, ulcer, or pollution, I suppose that I have not onely sufficiently approved the same, but also produced farre more then was requisite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Apion alleadgeth: For in the third book of his Egyptian History, he writ thus: Moses, as I have heard it from most ancient Egyptians, was borne at Heliopolis, who being instructed in the fashions of his countrey, converted such prayers which were wont to be said in open places and abroad, and caused them to be practised and accustomed in private Cloysters, such as were within the City, and ordained that in praying they should turne themselves towards the rising Sunne. For such is the situation of the Citie Heliopolis, and in stead of Obelisks or Pyramids, he erected certaine pillars, under which there were certaine ingraven Basons, on which the shadow hapning to fall (the place wherein they stood being discovered and in open ayre) they observed the same course that the Sunne doth in the firmament. See here what eloquence this learned man used.

Now,

- A Now this lye of his needeth no words to refute it, seeing it is clearly refelled by the effects: For when Moses first build that Tabernacle in honour of God, he had no such intent, nor fashioned any such form, neither ordained his successors to do the like: and after this when as Solomon builded the Temple in Jerusalem, he never thought of any such curiosity as Apion forgeth. He saith that he hath beene informed by those of antiquity, that Moses was a Heliopolitan, for you must understand that Apion himself was young, and beleeveth the relation of the aged sort of his acquaintance which conversed familiarly with him: yet cannot this learned Grammarian justifie where Homer was borne, neither from what countrey Pythagoras came, although in respect, they lived but yesterday: and as touching Moses, who lived so many ages, and so great a number of yeeres before them, he decideth the matter so easily, and giveth credit to the reports of antiquity so slightly, that it appeareth most manifestly that he is but a lyer. As touching the time wherein he saith that Moses led away the blinde, leprous, and lame: this diligent Author accordeth very willingly with that which he himself hath said. For Manethon saith, that the Jews departed out of Egypt about the reigne of Tethmosis, three hundredth ninety six yeeres before Danaus fled out of Greece. Lyfimachus, he saith, that this thing hapned during King Bocchoris time, that is to say, one thousand and seven hundredth yeeres before that time; Molon also and some others have alleadged their opinions. But Apion, who pretendeth to be a man of more credit then the rest, hath precisely and exactly set downe the time, averring that our departure was about the seventy Olympiade: nay more, in the first yeere thereof, wherein as he saith, Carthage was builded by the Phoenicians. Now hath he onely and purposely made mention of Carthage in this place, supposing it to be an infallible argument of the truth of his allegation: yet conceiveth he not, that he maketh a rod for his own taile, and draweth an argument against himself, by which himself may be convinced. For if we may give credit to the Phoenician Chroniclers as touching this Colonie, it appeareth by them that King Hiram lived more then one hundredth and fifty yeeres before the foundation of Carthage. The truth whereof I have heretofore approved out of the words of the Phoenicians, who report that Hiram was Solomon's friend, who builded the Temple in Jerusalem: and that he furnished him with much timber and other matter toward the finishing of that building. Now Solomon builded the Temple six hundredth and twelve yeeres after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt. And after he had inconsiderately reckoned the number of those which were driven out of Egypt in like manner as Lyfimachus had done, namely, of one hundredth and ten thousand men, he yeelded a most admirable reason, and such as may be easily beleeveth: from whence he pretendeth that the name of Sabbath was derived. For (saith he) after they had travelled for the space of six dayes, there grew certain inflammations in their groins, by reason whereof they rested on the seventh day, being safely arrived in the countrey which at this day is called Judæa, because the Egyptians call Sabbatos an Ulcer that groweth about the groine.
- Who can otherwise chuse but laugh at this fopperry? or contrariwise, who would not hate such an impudent custome in writing and coyning lies? For he reporteth as farre as a man may conjecture by his writings, that all the Jews who were to the number of an hundred and ten thousand persons, had these Ulcers in their secrets. Now had all of them beene hault, lame, blinde, and sickly as Apion reporteth, they could not have journied one day: but since they travelled thorow the Desert, and vanquished all armies that resisted them, it is no likely matter that all of them were sicke of a disease in their privy parts every seventh day: neither is it naturally possible, that such a disease should befall so many thousand men in their journey, and that they every day should travell a certaine space and a limited march; neither standeth it with any probability, but rather a manifest absurdity, that any such thing should befall them: but this admirable Apion saith, that they arrived in Judæa within the space of six dayes.
- Againe, he writeth that Moses ascending up the mount Sinai, which is betwixt Arabia and Egypt, hid himself in that place for the space of forty dayes, and descending from thence, gave Laws unto the Jews. But how I pray you was it possible for him to remain forty dayes, in a Desert without water? or how could all the Jews within six dayes travell from Egypt, into Jewrie? As for his Grammaticall divination of the word Sabbath, it savoureth too much of impudency, or at least of ignorance: for these words Sabbo and Sabbatum do greatly differ: for Sabbatum in the Jews language, signifieth rest from work, but Sabbo in the Egyptians tongue, betokeneth a disease about the privie parts, as Apion saith. See here what cavilling fictions this Egyptian Apion useth concerning Moses, and our departure out of Egypt; wherein he counterfeiteth and coyneeth absurdities unthought of by any G others. Shall we then wonder if he belie our forefathers, who maketh no bones to belie him- self? for being borne at Oafis, a towne in Egypt, this high unrepured honour of the Egypti- ans forswearth both his Countrey and Nation, and counterfeiting himself to be an Alex- andrian, he ratifieth his Nations wickednesse. No marvell then though he terme them Egyptians whom he hateth and railleth against, for if he had not beene perswaded that the Egyptians were wicked base people, he would never have denied himself to be their coun- treyman: for such as proudly boast of their famous countrey, esteeme it a credit to beare the denomination therof, and reprehend such as without just cause make themselves of their Nation. Wherefore the Egyptians are one of these two wayes affected towards us Jews, for either they claime us to be their countrey men, as glorying of us and their countrey; or else H for that, they and their countrey being infamous, they desire that we should be partakers of their ignominy. But indeed this worthy Apion seemeth so to inveigh against us, as there- by rewarding the Alexandrians for bestowing their Cities upon him: and knowing them to be at variance with the Jews at Alexandria, he as it were casteth a bone betweene them, and railleth not onely on the Jews of that Citie, but on all wheresoever: but he belieith both of them most impudently. But let us examine those hainous and enormous matters; and (as he saith) such as are not to be suffered, of which he accuseth the Alexandrian Jews. Com- ing (quoth he) out of Syria, they seated themselves neere the Sea-coast, where there was no Haven neere unto the surges of the water.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Jews own countrey was so also: yea herein Apion railleth against Alexandria, which he ma- keth his own countrey: for the sea-coast is part of Alexandria, and as all men judge the best place thereof to dwell in. Now if the Jews by force of armes so vanquished this place, that they could never since be driven out of it: it is no discredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gave them that place to inhabit, and the Macedonians did allot them as great priviledges as the Alexandrians had. I know not what Apion would have said, if the Jews had dwelt about Necropolis, and not about the Kings seat: their Tribes being even at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Apion have read the Epistles of King Alexander, and Ptolemæus Lagus, or others their successours Kings of Egypt, or seene the pillars that are erected in Alexandria, containing the priviledges that Caesar the great K granted unto the Jews, if I say he knew of these, and yet did presume to write the contrary, then he was a bad fellow: but if he was ignorant hereof, he was then an unlearned person. The like ignorance also discovereth he, where he wonders that the Jews that were in Alex- andria called Alexandrians. For all that are one Colonie, though very different people, yet do they all beare the name of their founder: and that I may shew prolixity, the Jews of Anti- och are called Antiochians, for Seleucus the founder made them also Citizens: the like may be also said of the Jews of Ephesus, and at the other Jonia, who by the Kings gifts enjoy the same priviledges with the rest of the Citizens. The Romanes also of their clemency have granted the name of their Nation, which is no small gift, not onely to private persons, but to great Nations in generall. To be short, the ancient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes, and Sa- bines, are called Romanes, or if Apion will take away this denomination of the City where- in men inhabit, let him cease to call himself an Alexandrian: for he being borne in the heart of Egypt, can in no wise be an Alexandrian, if the priviledge of the City be taken from him, as he would have it from us. And the Lords of the whole world the Romanes, have a- mongst all other Nations onely prohibited the Egyptians from having the priviledges of any Citie: and so this gallant gentleman being himself incapable of dignity, endeavourth likewise to hinder them from it, who have true right unto it.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that Citie, did not make choyce of us for want of people to furnish the same withall, but for that he bestowed the liberty thereof upon us as a reward and testimony of our vertue and fidelity; endeavouring in deed to ho- M nour & credit our Nation thereby: for Hecataeus reporteth that Alexander for the Jews good service and fidelity, bestowed upon them the countrey of Samaria, and freed them from pay- ing tribute for it. The same good affection towards the Jews of Alexandria, Ptolemæus Lagus continued after him, for he delivered into their hands the strong holds of Egypt (for that he judged that their valour and fidelity would keep them) and intending to make himself Lord of Cyrene and other places in Libya, he sent certaine Jews to inhabit the same. After him Ptolemæus Philadelphus did not onely release and set free all captives of our Nation in his countrey, but also did many times remit their payments of money, and (which was

A was the principall point of all) he desired to be instructed in our laws and holy Scriptures, and for this cause sent unto us, requesting that we would send him some learned men to interpret them unto him: and that this might be performed with more diligence, he committed the care hereof not to any but Demetrius Phalerus, Andreas and Arifseus, Demetrius being the onely mirror of learning in his age, the other two being Esquires of his own body: neither would he have ever desired to have beene instructed in our lawes and customes, if he had despised us and had not rather admired us. But Apion knew that almost all the Macedonian Kings his successors in order, did peculiarly affect our nation. For Ptolomæus the third which was also called Euergetes, conquering Syria by force, did no sacrifice unto the gods of Egypt for his victory, but came to Jerusalem, and there after our manner sacrificed many hostes unto our God, and to him dedicated gifts worthy of such a victory. Ptolomæus also surnamed Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, committed the rule of his whole kingdome unto the Jews, and Onias and Dositheus, both Jews, were Generals of his army, whose credit Apion detracts: whereas he rather ought to have admired them, and have thanked them for delivering Alexandria whereof he maketh himself a citizen.

For when there was a rebellion in Cleopatras kingdome, and all was in perill to be destroyed, these two men deliuered Alexandria from civill warre: But Apion saith that after this, Onias came and brought a little army into the City at such time as Terminus, the Romane Embassadour was there present. True it is, and that fact of his was most just. For Ptolomæus Physcon after the death of his father Ptolomæus Philometor, coming out of Cyrene, endeavoured to expell the Queene Cleopatra, and the Kings sonnes, to the end that he (contrary to all justice) might possesse the kingdome: and this was the cause why Onias took armes against him in Cleopatras behalfe, not forsaking his fidelity unto Kings in the time of necessity: yet God himself did manifestly witness his justice in this action. For when Ptolomæus Physcon presumed to fight against Onias his army, and tooke all the Jews, their wives and children that were in the city and bound them, and stripping them naked, cast them before Elephants to be destroyed (and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread upon them, made the said beasts drunken) all which fell out contrary to his expectation: for the Elephants forsaking the Jews which were cast before them, did fall upon Ptolomæus his friends that stood by, and slew many of them: which done there appeared unto Ptolomæus a most horrible vision forbidding him to harme the Jews: and his chiefeest best beloved concubine (also whom some call Isbaca, other Herene) came unto him and besought him to abstain from such impiety: whereupon he being sorry, did penance for that he had already committed, and that which he thought to commit, so that the Jews of Alexandria celebrate this day in remembrance that upon it God did manifestly deliver them: yet Apion (who speaketh well of no man) accuseth the Jews of impiety for bearing armes against Physcon; whereas indeed he ought rather to have commended them for it. But Apion extolleth Cleopatra the last Queene of Alexandria, onely for that she was unjust, and ingratefull unto us, when he rather ought to have reprovèd her, in whom all impiety and wickednesse reigned, both concerning her own kinred and her husbands who loved her, and also generally against all the Romans, and the Emperours his benefactors, who killed her own sister Arfina in the Temple who had not any wife offended her: she also treacherously slew her own brother, and destroyed her ancestors gods and sepulchers: and receiving the kingdome from the first Cæsar gift, she ingratefully rebelled against his sonne and successor, and infecting Antonie with her poysoned drinks and amorous enchantments, she made him rebell against his countrey, and to be unconstant to his own friends, depriving some of Kingly dignity, and compelling others to be instruments of her impiety. And what else shall we say of her, who in the battell by sea forced Antonie her own husband (who also had many children by her) to yeeld himself, the Empire, and army unto her, and become one of her followers. Lastly, when Alexandria was taken by Cæsar, she was so cruelly minded, that not remembering her own estate, she accounted this her safety, if with her own hand she might kill the Jews, that she might be cruell and trothlesse to every body.

F Is it not a glory thinke you to us, that (as Apion reporteth) in time of dearth and famine, wheat was plentiful in Jury, that it was not sold by measure? But Cleopatra was punished as she deserved. And we call great Cæsar himself to witness of our fidelity, and the service we did him against the Egyptians, the Senate also and their decrees, and the writings of Augustus Cæsar, wherein our deserts are testified. These letters Apion ought to have read, and to have examined all testimonies of us, which were left first by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomees, and what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mighty Emperours. ifso be Germanicus could not get come to suffice all the inhabitants of Alexandria, that was a token of scarcity and dearth, and not the Jews fault. For what all Emperours thought of the Alexandrian Jews, it is manifest enough: for the Jews want of come was not onely left unsupplied, but also the want of other Alexandrians. But they have alwayes kept that wherewith the ancient Princes did put them in trust, to wit, the keeping of the river, and whole countrey, as not being thought unfit for their purposes. But Apion thus urgeth us, If (quoth he) the Jews be citizens, how hap they worship not the same God, nor have the same religion that the rest of the Alexandrians have? To whom I thus answer, How hapneth that you Egyptians do so contend and warre against one another onely for diversity of religion? shall we hereupon conclude that you are all Egyptians, or not all men, because you worship and with great diligence nourish beasts against nature? yet our nation seemeth one and the same. If therefore amongst you Egyptians such difference of opinions be, why doest thou so marvel of this, that we in a strange place, to wit, at Alexandria, do constantly persevere in our first religion? But he saith that we are the cause of all sedition: which suppose he speake true of the Jews of Alexandria, yet are not all Jews in all places the cause of sedition, for we are knowne to be peaceable amongst our selves. But indeed as every one may perceive, the people like Apion himself are authors of sedition in Alexandria. For whilst the Greeks and Macedonians held Alexandria, they and we lived peaceably together, and they permitted us quietly to use our own solemnities: but when the number of Egyptians encreased, by confusion of time, sedition also by their meanes encreased: but our nation remained unperturbed. They therefore were authors of those troubles, not having the Government of the Macedonians, nor the wisdom of the Greeks, but using their Egyptian manners, and renewing their old hatred against us. And that wherewith all they hit us in the teeth befallerh them: for most of them not having the priviledges of the city themselves, call us strangers that have them. For none of the ancient Kings bestowed the libertie of the City upon the Egyptians, neither have any of the Emperours of Rome bestowed the priviledge. But Alexander himself brought us into the city, the Kings after him increased more priviledges, and it hath pleased the Romane Emperour to ratifie and confirme them. But Apion detracterh us for not erecting statues to the Emperours, as though the Emperours knew not hereof, or that they needed Apion to speak for them: whereas he should rather admire the Romanes magnanimity, and modestie, who compell not their subjects to violate their ancient laws and religion, but content themselves with such honours as the giver may with piety and equity give them. For they account not of forced honours which come of compulsion. The Greeks and divers other thinke it not amisse to erect statues, for they delight to have the pictures of their ancestors, wives and children, and some of their beloved servants also: what matvaile then if they accord to yeeld the like honour to Princes and Emperours? But our Law-maker, not as prophesying the Romanes power not to be revered: but foreseeing that it was neither profitable to God nor man, forbade us to make an Image of any living creature, much more of a not living God (as we will prove hereafter.) But he permitted us to reverence all good men, with any honour else due to God, and all those we give unto the Emperours, and people of Rome, and make our continuall sacrifice for them, and not onely upon workie dayes do this, at the proper cost of all the Jews; but upon such daies as we offer no other sacrifice, no not for our own children, we then sacrifice for the Romane Emperour, yeelding this honour to the Romane Emperour which we do to none else. And let this suffice to answer that which Apion alledgeh against the Jews of Alexandria: yet can I not but admire at them who gave him this occasion, namely, Pofidonius and Apollonius Molon, who accuse us for not worshipping the same gods that other do, although they lie all alike, slander our Temple most absurdly: and yet for all this they do not believe that they herein commit any impiety: whereas it is a most ignominious thing for any free-man to lie upon any occasion: much more of a Temple famous over all the world for sanctity. For Apion affirmeth that the Jews in that sacred Temple placed the head of an Ass, and worshipped it most religiously. And this (quoth he) was manifestly known at such time as Antiochus Epiphaneis spoiled that Temple, who found that Asses head being of masse gold, and great value. To this first slander I first answer, that were that true which he reporteth, yet an Egyptian ought not to have spoken against us for it: seeing that an Ass is of no lesse worth then a Goose, and other brute beasts that they honour for Gods. Was it possible that he knew not the contrary of his owne affirmations, by our deeds and Scriptures? For we use the same lawes that at the first we did, and remaine in them without change, and for all

A all that our City (as others also have) hath by the variable event of warre, been vexed and troubled, and that Antiochus surnamed the god, and Pompey the great, and Lisinius Crassus, and now lastly Titus Caesar have all vanquished our Temple, yet did they never finde in it any thing as Apion affirmeth, but sincere piety, not lawfull for us to disclose to strangers. And as touching Antiochus, many writers of good credit report, that he never had any just cause to spoile our Temple, but that he was drawn unto this fact for want of money. Not for that he was our enemy, but for that as from his friends and fellows, he sought supply, and found nothing in that place that was worthy of derision: and thus doe Polybius Megapolitanus, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholaus Damascene, Timagenes Cassius the Chronicler, and Apollodorus avow, who all doe witnesse, that Antiochus wanting money, brake the league he had with the Jews, and robd and spoiled their Temple being full of gold and silver. Apion ought to have considered this, had he not had an Assees heart, and a dogs impudency, which he and his Countrey men worship for gods. As for us, we doe neither honour nor reverence Assees, though the Egyptians doe their Crocodiles and Aspes, esteeming them that are bitten by Aspes, and devoured by Crocodiles, to be happy and fit for God.

But we esteeme those to be Assees which all our wisemen doe, to wit, them who beare burdens imposed upon them, and if coming into a field they fall to eate, and doe not that which they ought to doe, we use to beate them with many stripes, and force them to till the ground, and doe other drudgery. But Apion was either the greatest Asse that ever was, in telling a lie, or else having begun to doe it, he could not compasse his enterprizes, in that

C he found not any just cause of detraction against us. He addeth another fable of the Greeks detracting us: to the which I will make onely this reply, that it is more commendable and agreeing to piety, and lesse uncleannesse, to passe thorow the Temple, then for Priests to come and saie impious words and speeches: which they not respecting, laboured rather to excuse the sacrilegious Kings, then to write the truth of us and our Temple, endeavouring to curry favour with Antiochus, and to cover and hide his sacriledge, used against our Nation, for that he wanted money, believing us even in things that are to come. And Apion, as prophesying of the rest, saith that Antiochus found a bed in our Temple, and in it a man lying, and a table set before him, furnished with all fowles that use either sea or land,

D and that the man was heretofore astonished: And that so soon as Antiochus came into the Temple, he adored him as though he hoped for great helpe from the King, falling down at his feet, and with a stretched out arme, craving licence to speak: which the King granting, and willing him to declare what he was, and why he dwelt in the Temple, and the cause of his meats before him, the man with sighs and tears bewailed unto Antiochus his calamitie, saying, He was a Grecian: and that travelling in the countrey to get his living, he was suddenly seized upon by certaine our landish men, and brought unto the Temple, and shut up therein, and that no man might see him, and that he was there fed or fattened with all dainties that could be provided: and that at first this dainty fare made him joyfull, but afterward he began to suspect it, and lastly he was heretofore amazed, and then demanding of a Jew that administered unto him, for what cause he was there kept, he understood the Jews purpose, and

E law not to be revealed, for the fulfilling whereof he was there nourished, and that the Jews were wont to doe the like every year upon a day appointed: and to take a Grecian stranger, and feed him a year, and then to carry him to a wood, and there to kill him, and sacrifice him according to their rites and ceremonies, and to taste and eate of his entrails: and in the sacrificing of the Grecian, to sweare to be enemies to the Greeks, and the residue of the murdered man they cast into a certain pit. And that then this Greek reported unto Antiochus, that the time allotted unto him by the Jews to live was now almost expired, and therefore requested, for the reverence he bare to the Grecian gods, to save his blood from being spilt by the Jews, and to free him out of that imminent calamity.

This fable is not onely stuff full of all tragical crueltye, but also mingled with cruell impudencie: yet for all this, the first devisers hereof doe not free Antiochus from sacriledge, as they hoped hereby to doe, who writ it purposely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greek found in a bed, did not move him to come and sack our Temple, he not knowing of it before he came and found it so (as they say.) Antiochus therefore was most impious, and not assisted by Gods favour in that enterprize, (whatsoever these lyers mutter) as it is easie to learn of the fact of him committed. For we doe not onely differ from the Greeks in religion, but a great deale more from the Egyptians, and other Nations: and what Nation in the world is there, that sometime doth not travell thorow our Countrey?

Is it then probable that we onely renew that conspiracy against the Greeks? Or how it is possible that so many thousand people as are of our own Nation, should all eate of the entrails of one man as Apion reporteth? Or why did he not name this man whosoever he was? Or why did not the King carry him with trumpets into his countrey? seeing that in so doing he might have been esteemed full of piety, and a great favourer of the Greeks, and greatly strengthen himselfe against the hatred of the Jews by their aide? But I omit to speak more of this: for unsensible people voide of all reason, must not be reprehended in word, but by deeds: for all men that have seene the building of the Temple, can testifie what it was, and the undefiled puritie thereof. For it had foure porches about, and every one of them by our laws had severall keepers: and into the outward porch, all people, yea strangers might enter without breach of our laws, women onely excepted that have their monethly course. Into the second porch it was lawfull for onely Jews to come: and all Jews might goe into it, and their wives also when they were free from pollution of their flowers. Into the third porch, they onely of our Nation that were purified and sanctified might come. Into the fourth, might onely the Priests enter, who were cloathed with Priestly Stoles, and into the secret part of the Temple might onely the high Priest come, attired with a Stole proper to him onely: yea we are in all things so carefull of piety, that our Priests are appointed houses when to enter into the Temple.

For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Priests that were to sacrifice the hostes which were given them, entred into the Temple, and at noon again when it was shut, yea it was not lawfull to carry any vessell into the Temple: but there was onely there an Altar, a Table, a Censer, and a Candlestick, as is in our law mentioned, and there is no other secret or hidden mystery done, neither is there in that place any eating, and all the people can testifie this which I have here set down, and our writings doe the like. For notwithstanding that there are foure rites of Priests, and every Priests tribe containeth above five thousand men: yet every one waiteth on certain appointed daies in their turn, and their time of waiting being expired, others succeed them in sacrificing, and the day before they are to finish their waiting, they deliver up unto their successors the keyes of the Temple, and all vessels belonging thereto, in the full number that they received them: and nothing is brought into the Temple, pertaining either to meat or drink: yea and are forbidden to be offered at our Altar, those things onely excepted, whereof we make our sacrifice. What then shall we say of Apion, who examining nothing of all these, hath raised such incredible reports of us? How ignominious a thing it is for a Grammarian, not to be able to deliver the truth of a History? Well, he knew the piety used in our Temple, but he purposely omitted it: yet could he remember to tell a fained tale of the sacrificing of the Greek, his dainties and that hidden food, that all men also that would, passed thorow our Temple: whereas the most noble among our whole Nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be Priests.

This therefore is great impiety, and a voluntary forged lie, to seduce them that will not examine the truth. For they have attempted to slander us by those impieties before mentioned, not to be spoken of. And again, like one full of all piety, he denierh the vanitie of these fables, and reporteth that at such time as the Jews for a long time together, warred against the Idumzeans, Zabidas departing out of a City of Idumzea where Apollo was worshipped, came unto the Jews, promising them to deliver unto them Apollo the Dorian god, and bring him unto their Temple, if so be that all of them would there assemble themselves together: and that afterwards Zabidas did make a most excellent kinde of wooden instrument, and placed in it three ranks of candles, and put it upon him, and so walked like a star gliding on the ground (for that shape he resembled to them that were shaine off from him.) And that the Jews herat (seeing this strange vision) admired and were astonished, and standing afar off, they were all silent, and how by this shift Zabidas easily got into the temple, and took away the golden Asses head (for so he writeth plainly) & so to have returned speedily to Dora. Wherefore we may say that Apion leadeth an Ass, to wit, himself with fables and lies, for he nameth places that are not, and setteth down Cities to himself unknown: for Idumzea is a Province neer unto us, and bordering upon Gars, and there is no City in it called Dora: but in Phenicia neer unto the hill Carmelus, there is a City of that name, yet nothing consonant to Apions slanders, for it is foure daies journey from Judaea.

Why therefore doth he so rashly accuse us for not worshipping the same gods that other nations doe, seeing (as he saith) our predecessors did so easily beleve that Apollo would come

- A come unto them, and that he walked upon the earth with starres upon his back? Perhaps indeed they had never before seen a candle or lampe, themselves having so many: or is it likely that he walking thus quite thorow our countrey, where so many thousand men are, no one of them all met him? Did he in the time of warre finde the towns and villages, by which he past, without any watchmen? Well, I omit the rest. The gates of our Temple were
- B brought it again to our Temple, that there Antiochus might finde it, and so Apion might have another occasion of lying. He also belieth us concerning the oath which he saith we Jews doe take, swearing by the God of Heaven and Earth, and Sea, never to favour any stranger, and especially the Greeks. This liar might better have said, not to favour any stranger, and especially the Egyptians, and so his former lies and these should have had better correspondence with the beginning, if our ancestors had been expelled by their predecessors out of Egypt, not for their wickednesse, but for their own calamity. But we are so farre from the Greeks, that we scarcely ever think of them: so that no man can say that there is any enmity between us and the Greeks. But contrariwise, many of them have embraced our religion, and some of them therein persevered: others again have forsaken it; yet none of them will say that he heard this oath spoken of among us: but it should seeme that onely
- C Apion heard of it, in that he himselfe indeed forged it. Truly his wisdom and great providence is worthy to be admired (as shall hereafter appeare:) for he, to prove these his lies to be true, saith, that it is a certain testimony that the laws we observe are most unjust, and that we worship not God as we ought to doe, in that we were subject to divers Nations, and our Citie endured many calamities: Whereas touching themselves, they are of a Citie that flourisheth in absolute authoritie, accustomed to govern from the foundation thereof, and not to serve the Romanes. In effect, who can resist their valour? Truly no man but Apion would ever have flouted us herewith, seeing that few Cities so flourish and reign over other, that they again at no one time have been brought into subjection: For many Nations are subject to others: onely the Egyptians are freed from the captivitie of such as rule
- D Europe and Asia, for that (as they say) the gods fleeing into their countrey, were saved by entring into the bodies of beasts. Yet have they not indeed had any one daies libertie since the beginning of the world, neither under the government of their owne Princes, nor under strangers.

- I will not stand to reckon how often the Persians have wasted their Citie, destroyed their Temples, and slain their supposed gods. For it is not decent that I should imitate herein Apions foolishnesse: neither am I calling to memory what befell the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, the last of which, are recorded to have been most valiant, and first to have been most devout and religious: neither will I reckon up those most godly kings, amongst whom Craesus was one, who notwithstanding fell into great calamities. Moreover, I will not recount how the Castle of Athens was set on fire, and the temples of Ephesus & Delphos likewise, and many others. There is now one Apion, a new accuser of the Jews, who upbraideth them with their calamities, forgetting quite all misery that hath befallen his countreymen the Egyptians: but he was blinded with the fable of Sesostris (whom he saith to have been King of Egypt.) We could report and boast of our Kings, David and Solomon, who subdued many Nations unto them: but it is not fit here to speak of them. But Apion was ignorant of that which all the world knoweth, to wit, that the Egyptians have served first the Persians, and afterwards the Macedonians, and that as bondslaves: where we remaining in free libertie, reigned over all Cities round about us 120. years, even unto the time of Pompey the Great; and when all the other Kings were subdued by the Romanes, onely our Kings for their fidelitie and friendship towards them, were deare unto them. Oh, but this sticketh upon Apions stomack, that we have not had any famous men of our Nation, who have invented Arts and Sciences, and been excellent in wisdom, such as Socrates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and others, whom he setteth down, were: and which is most to be admired, Apion puts himselfe into the number of these famous men: and saith, that Alexandria is blessed and happy, that hath deserved to have such a Citizen as he is: and great reason that he himselfe should testifie that of himselfe, which all men else perceive in him, to wit, that he is an impudent deceitfull ceitfull fellow, both of corrupt life and manners. So that any Alexandrians had just cause to be sorry that they ever had any better opinion of him. But that our Nation had men equall at least unto those whom he mentioneth, all men know that please to read the book of our Antiquitie. The rest that his accusation containeth, it is not amisse to let passe without answer, for that it rather impeacheth the Egyptians, his own countrey men, then us: for he doth complain of us for sacrificing ordinary beasts, and for abstaining to eate swines flesh, and greatly laughed at Circumcision. Touching the sacrificing of these beasts, we doe as all Nations else doe: And Apion, inveighing against our sacrificing, sheweth himselfe to be an Egyptian; for were he either a Graecian or a Macedonian, he would not be herewith offended: for both Greeks and Macedonians doe vow to sacrifice Hecatombes to their gods, and use Priests in the banquets; and yet for all this, the World is not desolate of living creatures, as Apion feareth. G

But were all men so mad as the Egyptians, it would indeed be desolate of men, and filled with cruell beasts, which they (supposing them to be gods) doe diligently nourish. If any man shall aske of Apion, whom of all the Egyptians he judged to be a wiseman and most religious towards their gods, no doubt he would answer that the Priests are. For they say, that their first Kings in the beginning gave them these two commandements in charge: first, to seek wisdom; and next, to worship the gods: they also are all of them circumcised, and abstain from swines flesh, and no other Egyptian sacrificeth with them unto their gods. Apion therefore was surely blinde, when, in stead of detracting us, he speaketh ill of them, to gratifie whom, he took all this pains. For the Egyptians doe not onely use those customes which Apion in us disalloweth, but also doe teach others to circumcise themselves, as Herodotus reporteth. So that I verily thinke, that Apion was justly punished for blaspheming his countrey laws and religion. For being forced to circumcise himselfe to avoid a great disease, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this, his privie member rotting, he in extreame griefe and misery gave up the ghost. For wise men ought to persevere in their countrey laws in all piety, and not to deride and detract others: but Apion forsook his own religion, and slandered and belied ours. And this was Apions end: and here also should end this book, but that Apollonius, Molon and Lyfimachus, and certain others, partly for ignorance, partly for madnesse, have most injuriously belied our Law-maker Moses, and the Laws he made, detracting him as a deceitfull Magician, and then as the Author of all malice and impiety amongst us: and for such as teach no vertue nor goodnesse at all. I will therefore, as farre as in me lyeth, declare both our conversation in generall, and in particular: for if my judgement be any thing, our laws are most forcible both to piety, and to all humanity in generall, as also to justice, pains taking, and contempt of death. I onely request this favour of the Reader, that he will not with a prejudicate or malicious opinion, peruse these writings: for I doe not write this as a praise and vain ostentation of our Nation, but as a just Apology, refuting the slanderous reports that some have used against us. I

Apollonius doth not continually inveigh against us as Apion doth, but only here and there; sometime affirming us to be somewhiles hated both of God and man, sometime to be cowards, other sometimes contrariwise complaining of our Nations boldnesse. Saying moreover, that we are more sottish then any barbarous Nation: and that therefore we onely have had none of our Nation founders of Arts or Sciences, which are profitable for mans life: all which objections are easily refuted, if we shew the contrary to all these by him reported; both that we have obeyed our laws, and lived in all integritie. If therefore I be forced to shew that other nations have made contrary laws, not I, but they are to be blamed, who comparing ours with them of other Nations, affirme ours to be the worse: neither of which can charge us, either that these laws which I will briefly set down are not ours, or else that we have not persisted in them as we ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirme, that they who have framed themselves to live together under certain Rules and Ordinances, and kept them inviolate, and were the first founders of them, were more to be commended for humanity and vertue, then they who live under no rule nor ordinance at all: and every Law-maker endeavoureth so to challenge antiquitie for their own ordinances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themselves the first authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens lives. Which being so, it is the duty of a good Law-maker to make choice of that which is best, and most convenient for them, who are to obey their laws, and to satisfie them as much as may be, in proving their laws to be good and right, and both in wealth and wo, calamitie and felicitie, to remain in them, never changing K

A nor altering them. I therefore averre that our lawmaker is more ancient then any lawmaker mentioned: For Lycurgus, and Salon, and Selencus of Loctis, and those the Greeks admire, are modern, of late times in respect of him, as it is well known. For the Greeks themselves confesse, that in times past they wanted the name of law. This Homer can witnesse, who in his whole works never mentioneth this word, law, for the people of those times were not governed by laws, but by indefinite sentences, and the Princes pleasure, using customes but not written, and altering and changing them also as occasion served.

Moses more

NAMES.
This word, law, is not in Homer.

But our Lawmaker being very ancient (for this is every way manifest, even by our adversaries own confessions) shewed himselfe both a good Prince and counsellor unto his people: for making laws to direct and governe mens lives, he perswaded them voluntarily, to embrace them, and firmly to persist in them with all wisdom. And first of all let us consider the works of his greatnesse. For he undertaking the conduct of many thousand of our forefathers out of Egypt into our own countrey, he delivered them from many calamities, almost impossible to be avoided: for they being to passe thorow a place wherein was no water, and a very sandy ground, being also to warre and to keep their wives and children, and goods for the variable event of warres, he in all these shewed himselfe a most wise and prudent counsellor, and a true patron and guide unto them all. For he made all the multitude so to depend upon him, that he might perswade them whatsoever he pleased, and yet in none of all these did he usurpe any authoritie over them: and in that time and place wherein all men of authoritie assume power unto themselves, and use tyranny, at such time as the

The life of

C people doe oftentimes offend and live in all manner of impiety; he then being in authoritie did contrariwise use all lenity, and mildnesse, to the intent that he might be a pattern of ver-tue and justice to all the rest, giving all those that willingly followed him most assured safe-tie, using in all accidents most strange works. And for this cause he rightly deemed God to be his captain and counsellor: and first examining himselfe, and finding that all the laws he had set down were agreeable to the will and pleasure of God, the chiefeest care he now had was how to perswade his people the same, which he himselfe now knew: for they who direct their lives according to the will of God, avoid all sinne as our lawmaker did, being neither Magician nor deceiver as his enemies injuriously report, but such a one as the Greeks doe boast Minos and others after him to have been: for some of them affirmed their laws to be and counsellor

D made by Jupiter, others by Apollo and Delphos Oracle, either so beleiving themselves, or else thinking that the people would be easily so perswaded. Now who of all the lawmakers made the best law, and who did most rightly thinke of God, he that compareth all their laws together may easily know, for now occasion is offered to speak of them: there are therefore an infinite company of Nations and laws amongst men, and some Nations are ruled by Monarches, other some by the common consent of the people. But our lawmaker doing neither of these, did as one should say therein declare his common wealth to be divine; chiefely assigning all power and principalitie over us to God, causing all men to fixe their mindes and cogitations on him, as the onely giver and author of all goodnesse, giving them to understand, that whatsoever in their necessitie they entreate him for, he heareth their E prayers, and understandeth what every man doth in private, yea his very cogitations; and that he is one, unbegotten, and in all times immutable and eternall, differing in a most excellent shape from all mortall creatures: and this we know, but we are altogether ignorant what God is as touching his substance and essence.

The origin of laws amongst
the Greeks.

And thus the wisest Greeks that ever were, judged of God, who how learned they were (he giving the ground of all their knowledge) I now omit to rehearse: and that these things afore rehearsed are best and most agreeable to the nature and magnificence of God, many doe witnesse, as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Plato, and after them the Stoicks, and almost all other Philosophers have so thought of the divine nature. But they delivering this their Philosophy in short speech, durst not publish the truth of their doctrine among the people, already seized upon by superstitious opinions. But our lawmakers works and words so agreed, that he satisfied at large all his people, and they that were to be borne of them and their successors, inspiring as it were a certain constancy into them to persevere in the same, still referring the cause of his laws to their profit and commodity. For he did not affirme the worship of God onely to be part of vertue, but he assigned other parts thereof, to wit, fortitude, justice, and mutuall concord of all his citizens. For all our actions, speeches, and what else soever, are all referred to divine piety. Which he left not touched without any more discourse of it. For these two are the methods of all discipline and morallitie, whereof one frameth and directeth the speech, the other the manners and actions, which being G so, other law-makers were indeed wise in advice and counsell, and yet they made choice of one of these methods, and left the other: For the Lacedemonians were instructed in manners, and not in words, as also they of Creet were: but the Athenians and almost all the Greeks were directed and trained up by laws in every thing they were to doe, yet never could they put their written laws in practice: but our law-maker very industriously did con-joyne both these together, for he neither omitted the training them up in manners and good exercises, neither did he surcease to leave them written laws. And first of all, making his entrance from the very meats, and prescribing to every one a convenient diet, he lett no man liberty amongst us to direct himselfe in the least matter concerning his meate, but he by laws defined, both from what meats we were to abstain, and what to eate, and what H ought to be our ordinary diet, as also when we ought to labour, and when to cease from work, so that we as it were under the government of a father or master, might neither sinne willingly, nor for ignorance: for he did not appoint punishment for them that were ignorant of it, but by law enacted a most necessary and milde chastisement for the voluntary offenders: and for this cause he did not onely will, that we should once or twice or often heare the laws, but that once every week we all, omitting other businesse, should come to heare the laws, and so learne them perfectly, which things all other law-makers as it is well known omitted: All which laudable customes all other law-makers have neglected, and the most part of men are so farre from living according to their own laws, that they are altogether ignorant of them: and having offended their laws through ignorance, they then I learne by other mens means, that they have made breach of their laws, yea the chiefeft and most eminent men amongst them, doe professe herein that they are ignorant, causing those that are learned and skilfull in their laws, to sit as it were in commission with them to direct them. Whereas every one of our Nation being demanded of our laws, can answer as readily as he can tell his own name: for every one of us learning them as it were so soone as we come to the use of reason, we have them as it were written and printed in our mindes, and by this meanes both we offend more seldome, and when we offend we are sure to be punished.

And this especially is that which hath caused such an unity and concord amongst us. For to worship one God all after the same maner, and nothing to differ in maner and conversation K one from another, is the onely way to establish amity and concord in a Common-wealth. For onely amongst us no man shall hear any different speeches and opinions concerning God, which thing amongst all nations else is most frequent and ordinary: for amongst them not onely every one of the common people doth speak his pleasure in this point, but divers Philosophers also presume to do it, some of them with their blasphemous speeches altogether destroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudency denying him to have any care of men: neither is there any difference amongst us of affairs pertaining to mans life, but all men with us follow one comon expresse labor, and we all joyntly affirme the Son of God, and that he hath care of humane affaires, and all our actions and exercises: yea any one may learn of our women & children, that all things whatsoever, are to be reduced to piety. Hence L it groweth that some detract our nation, for that amongst us were no men inventors of new matters and acts: to whom we will thus answer, that other nations account it a glory not to persist in any thing that their forefathers used, & hold them of most account amongst them, that can best transgresse their forefathers wisdom. But we contrariwise do account it the chiefeft point of wisdom and vertue, neither to do, nor think any thing contrary to that which our ancestors have decreed, which is a token that our law was established by as good advice as was possible. For those laws that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faulty. But amongst us who beleve that our law was first established by the will and pleasure of Almighty God, nothing is pious and vertuous which may any wise impugne the same. For who can take away any tittle therof, or adde better in the stead? or M who is he that can transfer and carry us from the observance of them, and ordain for us better laws to govern our Commonwealth? Or what law can be more just and better, then that which the wisdom of God (who is the Lord of all things) hath established? He first of all permitted the disposing of all principall affairs to the Priests in generall, and most wisely constituted a high Priest as their head: neither were they chosen to this dignitie by our lawmaker, who either exceld in nobilitie of birth, or riches: but he appointed such to sacrifice unto God, who were known to excell others in wisdom and sanctity: these doe both keepe

Akeepe our lawes, and observe all other things belonging to their office with all integritie; for our Priests are appointed over-seers of all things, and to judge all strifes and controversies, and to punish the offenders. What monarchie then or kingdome can be more holy then this? Or how can God be better honoured then amongst us, where all the people are prepared to piety, and the Priests commanded so to rule and governe the common-wealth, as if they were celebrating some festivitie? And whereas other nations cannot celebrate their mysteries, which they tearme sacrifices, in a few daies; we with joy and pleasure and immutable wils, doe celebrate our sacrifice continually without intermission: It resteth now that I set downe our precepts and lawes, as arguments of that which I have said. The first is of God: of whom our law saith, God hath all things, he is most perfect, most blessed, he is sufficient both for himselfe and all things else, he is the beginning, midst, and ending, famous amongst all things for his workes and benefits, more manifest then any thing else, but his shape and greatnesse is to us unspeakeable, all matters (how precious soever) being compared with his excellent beautie are nothing worth, and all art compared with his invention is unartificiall, we can neither see, conceive, nor imagine any thing like him. He is holy, for we see his works, the light, the heaven and the earth, the Sun, the Moone, rivers, and sea; so many different shapes of living creatures, and encrease of fruits: All these God himselfe made, not with hands or worke, nor as one needing any to helpe him, but he seeing them to be good, they were presently made. He is to be followed of all men, who ought to worship him by the exercising of vertue; for this is the most holy way to please him. We have one temple, as also one God, which temple is common to all men, as he is the common God of all men. For similitude alwaies pleaseth, him doe all our Priests honour with sacrifice, and he amongst them hath the first place, who by birth is the chiefe: and he first sacrificeth to God, seeth the lawes observed, judgeth controversies, and punisheth those that are convicted by the law: whosoever disobeyeth him, shall be punished as one that rebels against God himselfe; he offereth sacrifices not pertaining to gluttony or drunkennesse, for God is not pleased with such sacrifices, but is rather injured, & superfluous expences are thereby made.

But God loveth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behaviour, and especially requireth in us that sacrifice, an inviolable chastitie. In our sacrifices offered for our common good, we first of all pray in common, and then every one for himselfe, because we are all fellowes, and he that delighteth herein more then in his own life, is most acceptable to God. We pray and vow unto God, not requesting riches of him, for he of his owne accord bestoweth them upon every one, and left them amongst us: but we pray that we may have part of them, and having gotten them may keepe them. Our law hath also appointed purifications both from our chamber-bed and carnall copulation, and many other things, which are too long to rehearse: And this is our speech and opinion of God, who himselfe is our law. And what concerning marriage? Our law onely alloweth naturall copulation betweene man and wife, done to the intent to get children. But that men should abuse one another against nature, it altogether disalloweth, and punisheth such offenders with death. It commandeth us to marry, not respecting the dowry, neither must we take women violently and by force, nor allure them by deceitfull perswasions, but that we rather obtaine his good will, who may grant and use ordinary meanes to perswade. It also appointeth that a woman shall be in all things inferior to the man, neither is she to obey in committing wickednesse, but as one under government. For it is God that gave man this authority. With her the husband onely may lawfully accompany, and it is abomination for her to make triall of another man: and who so attempteth this, can no waies avoid death: the like penaltie attendeth him, if he offer violence to a virgin desposued unto another man, or if by perswasions he overcome a married woman or other, that hath children under her, and all this our law commandeth: It hath also interdicted all women from concealing their children being borne, or otherwise to destroy them, for so shee should be a child killer, destroy soules and mankind: Whoso therefore useth carnall copulation and corruption is uncleane by our laws, and women after lawfull copulation must wash themselves, judging that a part of their soule was by this act defiled, and she being puffed up was wounded in her body, and therefore our law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawfull for them to feast and banquet at their child-birth, whereby an occasion of drunkennesse may grow; but that their beginning should be temperate: they are likewise commanded to traine up their children in learning that they may learne the law, and actions of their forefathers, and imitate them; that so being trained up in the law, they may not sinne nor transgresse them by ignorance.

Our law hath also provided for the buriall of the dead, that our funerals should neither be pompous, nor our sepulchers gorgeous, commanding every household to performe all necessities touching the buriall of their dead, permitting all men at any ones death to assemble themselves together, and bewaile the dead: It also commandeth every one (yea even the dead mans owne family) to purifie themselves after the buriall, and to goe as farre off, as seeming to be uncleane. It also appointeth punishment for them that have committed murder, either wilfully or against their will. It bindeth every man to obey his parents next after God, and commandeth that those children that doe not shew themselves grateful unto them, or in any thing doe grieve them, that they should be stoned to death: It also commandeth all young men to reverence old men, because God is elder to us all. It permiteth not friends to conceale any impiety; for God is not their friend who doth not disclose them: and if friends fall out that doe know one anothers secrets, yet they are commanded not to bewray them. If any Iudge take a bribe, he is to be punished with death for omitting justice, and assisting the guilty. No man must take any thing away that he himselfe placed not, and no man must take that which is not his owne. No man for lending must take usury; and many such like things our law commandeth, concerning cause of communion betweene us and others.

It is also not amisse to recount how our law-maker provided for the entertaining of strangers amongst us: For he seemeth so to have provided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our owne lawes, nor deny to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally that will come and live under our lawes, judging the community of mans life, not so much to consist in the nation whereof we come, as in the unity of our minds and conversation. He forbiddeth others that are strangers, and come not with that intent to be admitted to our solemnities, yet he commanded us to exhibite unto them all other things necessary: and that we should give unto all men, fire, water, meat, and bury them being dead. He hath also most mildly determined how we ought to deale with our enemies, that we neither destroy their countrey with fire, nor cut downe their fruit-trees. We are also forbidden to rob and spoile those that are slaine in fight, and deale injuriously with our captives; and especially if they be women: yea he so endeavoured to teach us humanity and mildnesse, that he provided, that we use even unreasonable beasts courteously, and only imploy them to serve our lawfull need, and no further: for he forbiddeth us to kill any tame thing bred in houses, and that we should not kill the old birds and their young together, and although many wild beasts, enemies to mankind, do assist us in our labours, yet he commanded to spare them also. And in every point he established humanity and mildnesse, amongst us, using (as is before said) laws to direct us therein, enacting also other, how they who infringe the foresaid laws, may be with all severity punished: for the punishment allotted to the violators hereof, is for the most part death: as if any man commit adultery, ravish a virgin, use the sin against nature with another, or suffer himselfe to be so abused. Wee also have lawes concerning our servants, and our measures, and waights, and unlawfull bargaines and sales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is another mans, or which is not his owne, all these are to be punished not as other nations punish them, but much more grievously. But whosoever either injureth his parents, or committeth impiety against God, he shall presently be destroyed: but they that observe this law are rewarded, not with gold or silver, nor with a crowne beset with precious stone: but every one having his conscience to witnesse, doth greatly profit, and gaine eternitie; as both our law-maker prophesieth, and God himselfe doth most assuredly promise to them that observe them. And if it chance that we be forced to suffer death for them, yet do we joyfully go to execution, nothing doubting but that we shal so exchange this life for a better: I should be loth to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifest: for many of our forefathers, only for that they refused to speake against our lawes, or otherwise then our lawes permitted, have most manfully and constantly indured all torments and death it selfe. If our nation were unknowne to all the world, and that this our voluntary observation of our lawes were not manifest to all the people, if any man should report unto the Greeks, that either he had read this which I have declared, or else that he had found people in a strange land, such as we be, having so pious and honest opinions concerning God, and who had for many ages persevered therein, I doubt not but they would all admire & wonder hereat, considering the great mutability amongst themselves. To be short, there are some who sticke not to deride them who have lately written of the government of Commonwealths and lawes, as though they had written things fabulous and altogether impossible. And that I speake nothing of other Philosophers that have written of this argument, that divine

A divine Plato amongst the Greeks, a man who in honest life, vertuous speech, and sound philosophie excelled all others. This man is almost continually scoffed at by them, who in their own conceit are skilfull in civil affaires, and brought in as a Vice in a comedie. Where as whosoever considereth his writings with diligence, shall often and easily finde matter agreeable with most mens manners: yea this Plato himself confesseth, that he dare not by reason of the common peoples ignorance set down the true opinion of God. But many think Plato's words full of vanity, and licentiousnesse, and admire Lycurgus, and every one commendeth the city of Sparta, for that it so long time persevered in his laws. It is therefore an evident demonstration of vertue to remain in their laws. But if those who so admire the Lacedemonians, do compare them with us, and the time during the which their laws were in force, with the time of our common-wealth: they shall finde that ours hath continued more then two thousand yeers. They shall also finde that the Lacedemonians did onely perfectly observe their laws, during such time as they were in prosperity and liberty, and that when their fortune changed, they then became unmindfull of their laws.

But we, who have felt many thousand mis-haps by reason of the often change of Princes in Asia, have not in these our last miseries and evils forsaken our law. Neither can any man say, that liberty and licentious life is the cause, why we so diligently observe them, seeing that whoso please may see sufficient prooffe, that they tie us to more strict life and laborious, then those of the Lacedemonians did them. For they neither tilled the earth, nor used any handy-craft, but ceasing from all labours and pains-taking, lived in their city fat and faire-liking, having both their meat and all other necessities provided and prepared for them by others, and esteemed that onely their felicitie to do or endure any thing, so that they might prevail against those against whom they enterprised warres: and that they failed also herein, I omit to rehearse. For not onely one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole companies of them, forgetting their own laws, yeelded themselves to their enemies. And can any one tell of, I say not so many, but of one or two of us that ever was treacherous to his own laws, or that feared to die for them? I mean not a common death, such as souldiers are subject unto, but such a death as is affected by all torments and tortures that can be devised. Which I think those that prevailed against us imposed upon us, not for hatred, but that they desired to see so admirable a matter, and to see if we being but men, and such who esteemed it the greatest impietie possible to do it, could be compelled by them to speak or do any thing contrarie to our laws. Yet it is no wonder that we for our law do die with such constancie, rather then any other Nation: for other nations cannot abide to endure that which we account a trifle, to wit, labour and simple fare, and that no man eat whatsoever, or what he desireth, to lie with them whom he ought not, or to be idle (except he be of noble birth) or go gallantly attyred: and we are alwayes carefull that when we fight against our enemies, we observe our laws concerning our meats. And thus we take pleasure to observe and keep our laws, and to exercise fortitude in obeying them.

The Jews compared with the Lacedemonians.

The strict laws of the Jews.

Let now Lyfimachus or Molonus passe, and such as they be, wicked lying writers, and sophisters, deceivers of young men, and detractors of our own Nation, as though we were the wickedest people living. As for me, I will not examine the laws of other Nations: for it is our custome to keep and observe our own, not to detract others; yea and our Law-maker openly prohibited us from blaspheming such, as other nations hold for gods, onely for the name of God attributed unto them: yet may we not leave the objections of our accusers unanswered, seeing that which we are to speak against them, is not our own device, but many before us have spoken it. Who then of all the wise Greeks will not condemne the most famous Poets, and especially, the law-makers, who at first brought and settled such vain opinions of the gods among the common people? affirming the number of them to be so many as they thought good; and to be born at divers times one of another, allotting to every one his proper place, as unto other living creatures: some to be under the earth, others in the sea, and the ancientest amongst them in hell, fettered and bound: and those whom they place in heaven, in words they do terme him a father, but in deeds they shew him to be a tyrant, and for this cause they report that his wife, his brother, and his daughter, whom they affirm to have been born of his brain, conspired against him to binde him, and hang him, as they report him also to have dealt by his father. Against these vanities all excellent and wise men do worthily inveigh, who beside this already rehearsed, in derision adde, how some of the gods are young, and some old, and some infants, others are gods of arts and sciences, and one is a smith, another a weaver, another a pilgrime, and is at variance with mortall men, others delight in musike, others in shooting: moreover, that they are at variance one with another amongst themselves, & that they fall out one with another G in mens behalf, and that not only one of them layeth violent hands upon the other, but that also they are wounded by mortall men, and sorrow and feel griefe for the wounds, and that which is most abominable of all, do use carnall copulation with mankind, and that most undecently, that their unbridled lust is extended both to men and women. Then that their chiefe god of all, whom they call father, contemned and drowned certain women whom he himself had deceived and gotten with child, and that he could not deliver the children born of these women from calamitie, for that destiny had obliged him, nor see their deaths without teares. This is all good stufie, as also is that which followeth, to wit, adulteries committed in Heaven, so openly, and impudently amongst the gods, that some professe H themselves to envie their fellow gods and goddesses tied together in such filthinesse. And what should the rest of them do, when as their King and the most ancientest amongst them, could not refraine his lustfull licentiousnesse from the company of women? Moreover, some of them became servants unto men, and some built houses for money, and others became shepherds, others like malefactors were chained in hell. What man then that ever was accounted wise, would not blush at these follies, and reprove the inventors hereof, and the foolish beleivers also? Others presumed to faine both terror, and feare, and madnesse, and such simplicitie, as that they might be deceived, and all other naughty passions to be found in the nature of their gods, and have perswaded whole cities to offer sacrifice to the most Noble amongst them. And they are in great perplexitie, thinking that some of the gods are the givers of all good things, others againe to be their enemies, and so seeke to I please them with gifts as they would doe wicked men; and they are verily perswaded, that they shall sustaine great damage by their meanes, except they do daily pacifie their wrath by frequent gifts. What is the cause of this shamefull ignorance, and erroneous iniquitie concerning God? Truly I am perswaded, for that their first Law-makers were themselves herein to seeke, and ignorant of the nature of God, and that they did not faithfully deliver unto their Common-wealth, so much as themselves knew concerning this point: but as though it had been a thing of least moment, did wilfully let it passe, giving licence to Poets, and permitting them to deifie and make gods whom they pleased, and that the Orators should write of the common-wealths affaires, and tell what them liked of strange gods.

Moreover, the painters and image-makers amongst the Greeks, had a great hand in making K of gods, it being lawfull for them every one to frame what shape he list, and how he list, some of earth, others of colours: and the chiefeft god-makers amongst them use ivorie and gold to make their god of; a true argument of their mntable noveltie. And then the ancient gods whom they first so honoured and revered as they could possibly devise, being now withered with age, are out of credit, and other youngsters possesse their places and honours: their temples also some are desolate, others newly erected, as men please.
Whereas contrariwise, they ought most constantly to keepe their opinion of God, and his religion.

Apollonius Molon was one of these proud fooles: but those Grecians that followed true Philosophie, knew all that is already said, and the cold reasons of this allegory, and there- L fore did justly despise them, and agreed with us in the true and decent opinion of Gods nature. Which Plato well seeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a commonwealth, and sendeth Homer away very honourably crowned and anointed, lest that he with his fables should destroy or deprave the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others especially imitated our Law-maker, as he did herein also, commanding all his Citizens that all of them should perfectly learne his lawes, and that for no casualtie, any strange forraine custome should be admitted into their Citie, but that their Common-wealth should be pure, and they persist in the observation of their lawes. But Apollonius Molon not respecting this, enveigheth against us, for not receiving into our society men of strange opinions or religion, whereas not onely we doe so, but commonly all Greeks, yea and the most prudent A- M mongst them. The Lacedemonians did expell all strangers, and did not permit their citizens to travell into other countries, fearing that by both these wayes their lawes might be corrupted. They therefore are to be spoken against rather then we, seeing they neither admit strangers to converse with them, nor to inhabite amongst them, no nor impart their religion unto them; but we, though not desirous to learne other Nations religion, yet do we not denie to impart ours to strangers that desire to embrace it: which if I be not deceived is a token of magnanimitie, and clemency in us: but this shall suffice concerning the Lacedemonians, Apollonius was ignorant how matters stood with the Athenians, who boast that

A that their citie is free from all nations: for they did most severely and without all mercy punish those that did but speake any word against their God. For what was the cause of Socrates his death? he neither betraied the citie to enemies, nor destroyed their temples, but onely swore by a strange oath, which as he said (whether in jest or in earnest) a divell taught him, and for this offence he was put to death, by drinking hemlocke: his accusers alledging, that he corrupted young men, and contemned the lawes and religion of his countrey. And this Socrates sustained being a citizen of Athens.

Socrates a citizen of Athens

Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia: and for that he affirmed the Sun which the Athenians worshipped for God, to be a fiery stone, he was by the sentence of some few condemned to die. They also proclaimed that whosoever would kill Diagoras of Melus, should be rewarded with a talent for his labour, onely for that this Diagoras was said to deride their mysteries: Protagoras also had bin by them taken and put to death, had he not made quick escape, onely for that they supposed him to have written certaine doubts of the Athenian gods. And what wonder is it that they so used these famous men, who spared not to use the like crueltie upon women? For they killed a priest, for that some accused her to worship strange gods: and their law appointed, that who so did introduce strange gods into their city, should be punished with death. It is therefore evident that they who enacted such straight lawes, beleaved not the gods of other nations to be gods: for had they beleaved in them, they would not have deprived themselves of the benefit of many gods. C yet doe they thinke themselves bound to maintaine their owne lawes, as best, so that they slew Anacharsis a famous Greek, that came unto them, onely for that he seemed to attribute too much unto the Grecian gods; yea thou maist find many among the Persians, who for this cause have beene tortured. And it is evident that Apollonius approoved the Persian lawes: for when the Greeks admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I meane the fortitude they shewed in burning of their temples, this Apollonius in all things imitated the Persians, violating other mens wives, and putting out their childrens eyes; whereas our lawes adjudge him to death that so useth unreasonable beasts: And neither the feare and terroure of potentates, nor the favour of them whom all men reverence, could ever cause us to forsake or abandon these lawes: neither do we exercise fortitude, to the end to deprive other men of their goods and fortunes by warre, but to keepe our owne lawes: and we who patiently put up all other injurie, yet if any man do in our religion provoke us, we presently seeke revenge, not respecting our owne abilitie, yea though thereby we worke our owne utter ruine, and calamitie. What therefore should move us to imitate the lawes of other nations, when they that made those lawes (yea even the law-makers themselves) did transgresse them? Or how can the Lacedemonians avoid reproach for their inhospitalitie, and neglecting marriage? Or the Elians and Thebans for accompanying with men, contrary to the law of nature, which fact most shamefull, they deemed good and necessary. Yea not content to doe so themselves, they also ascribed the like unto their gods to be done by them (which the Greeks also now of late have done) and for this cause they refused to marry with their owne women, judging their satisfaction to be contrary to the prescript of nature: But I will speake no more of punishment, neither how great malefactors those first law-makers freed from punishment, being bribed with money, and how unjust they were in the laws appertaining to wedlocke. It is long to examine how great occasions of impiety they gave. For many have already long agoe forsaken their lawes: which cannot be said of us, who for our lawes have suffered losse of our cities, fortunes and lives, we keeping and persisting in our lawes even unto death; and if any Jew be in a strange country where there is a tyrant King, yet doth not he so feare him, that he would for his command in any jot transgresse our lawes. If therefore we doe valorously endure thus much for our lawes, all men must needs grant our lawes to be very good: but if they say we suffer all these calamities for to maintaine wicked or naughty lawes, what punishment are they not worthy of, who having (as they say) better lawes then we, do so easily forsake them, whereas we doe maintaine ours even with our owne lives? others, communion of life, and conversation: yea the common people did long since imitate our piety: neither is there any nation either Greeks or Barbarians, who have not after some manner observed a Sabbath as we doe, and fasting dayes, and candlesticks with light, all which they learned of us, yea many doe also observe our customes concerning their meates, and our unitie and concord, wherein we excell all other nations, our communitie also and industry in arts and labours, and sufferance for our lawes. And which is most to be admired, our law, not having any to force us to observe it, hath so obliged our hearts, that as God is of all the world honoured without compulsion, so are our lawes amongst us all, we not forced thereunto: And whosoever doth diligently consider his owne nation and family, shall finde that which I have reported, to be true. I will now generally reprehend the voluntary malice of all men: for either they meane that we having these good lawes doe yet little esteeme them, and follow worse, or if they doe not so meane, let them hold their malicious tongue from any further calumnation. For I doe not take upon me the defence of this cause, for that I beare any hatred to any man, but for that I and all the Jewes doe honour and reverence our Lawmaker, and beleeve that whatsoever he prophesied proceeded from God: yea although ourselves did not know the goodnesse of our lawes, yet the multitude of them that imitate them, were a sufficient motive to induce us thereunto. But I have at large and with all sinceritie discoursed of our lawes, and Common-wealth in my Bookes of our Antiquitie. And now againe I have made mention of them neither in contumely of other nations, nor in praise of our owne, but onely to reprove such as have most maliciously and impudently belied us, contrary to the knowne truth: And I thinke I have already fully performed that which I have promised. For I have shewed our nation (contrary to their affirmations) to be most ancient, which I have proved by the testimony of many ancient writers, who in their workes have mentioned us.

Our adversaries affirme us to have come of Egyptians: I have shewed that our forefathers came into Egypt out of some other place. They alledge that we were expelled Egypt for their miserie, in that they were infected with disease, I have proved that they came from thence to their owne countrey, by meanes of their owne prowesse and force, of their owne accord: Others labour to defame our Law-maker as a wicked person, whose vertue many of ancient times, and so long time as hath beene since him, doe witnesse. It is not needfull to speake more largely of our lawes: for they by themselves appeare pious and good, and such as doe not invite or incite us to the hatred of other nations, but rather to communion and friendship, being both enemies to iniquitie, and commanders of justice, banishers of luxuriouse, and teachers of frugalitie and labour: forbidding all warres enterprized for avarice, and preparing the people to shew fortitude in them, and for them, inflicting inevitable punishment upon their transgressors, not easily to be deceived by glazing speeches; and executing in action, all that they in word command: yet amongst us the execution of them and observation is more ready then the words of them: I therefore confidently affirme that we doe teach more pious and vertuous maners then other nations doe. For what can be better then inviolate piety? what more just then to obey the law? what more profitable and commodious, then to be at unitie and peace amongst our selves, and neither to forsake one another in calamity, nor injure one another in prosperitie, to contemne and despise death in time of warre, and in peace to labour and till our grounds, and to use other arts and workes, and alwayes to thinke and beleeve, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and disposeth all things? If this be either written or reserved by any one before this time, we are then to thank them as being their schollers: but if they are knowne never before to have beene extant, then we are knowne to be the first authors and inventors of it. Let therefore all Apions and Molans goe, and all others that with them are convicted of lying and slandering. And this booke is written to thee Epaphroditus who lovest the truth, and to others who by thee will, or are desirous to know the same.

Ioseph doth not falsly boast himself to have attained to the excellencie of the Greek tongue, and this book will sufficiently witnesse the same, wherein he shewed both great vanity and emphasis, insomuch as he esteemeth to have handled that famous work with eloquent stile, and the ornament of discourse. S. Ierome for this cause emitteeth this book, Great eloquence; Suidas wisly putteth out of them both we amend the corrupted stile, and call it de rationis regimine, that is, the rule of reason: for the scope of this book tendeth all to prove, that reason is of no force in man, except it bear sovereignty over all inordinate appetites. This is most evidently proved by the books of the Maccabees, in the scripture: which books the Iews did not receive as canonicall, yet do they account it among their sacred writ. I cannot but congratulate this worthy Colledge (which though famous for many other things, yet is more happy) for that it is so blessed, as to enjoy so worthy and unspeakable a treasure: Or rather all Colonia Agrippina, that happy and fortunate city; yet in nothing more happy, then for that it alone doth in her bosome shrieve so many, so sacred, and excellent pledges of piety: yet should it be more happy, if it could expresse their vertues; whose sacred relicks it so religiously keepeth, and imitate their manners whose bodies it possesseth, to wit, if in sincerity of religion it imitated the piety of three Kings, and the sacred puritie of the eleven virgins, if it resembled the most valiant young men, the Maccabees, and the invincible courage of that woman, whose valorous constancy no miserie could conquer. And this best portion and part of her felicity, this worthy city might bestow upon her self, yea and double the same.

Do thou go forward in that which thou hast in hand, to wit, in spreading the praise of those martyrs, making that vertuous example more commendable, and your City more famous.

SETTING DOWN THE MARTYRDOME OF THE MACCABEES.

Am at the instant request of Polybius of Megalopolis, to put in writing the constant suffering of the Maccabees, worthy all admiration, not in a Rhetoricall and pleasing stile, but rather after our own countrey fashion, thereby to exhort our nation to patience in their calamities. For first of all, it is necessarie for us to speak something of reason, and assigne unto it the power and vertue to deliberate. For he who hath once fully determined to suffer all miserie for the sake of God, is in my opinion already a martyr: it is therefore a great sin, it once to have so determined; and therefore, as is above-said, reason beareth the rule of all inferiour passions, and then if destiny deny us opportunitie to suffer, yet have we suffered all, because we purposed to suffer all. Whoso therefore will renounce the world, and aspire onely to celestiall things, he must exercise sobriety, banish gluttony, with his page lasciviousnes, and all other such like vices as may possesse and captiue the minde: he must likewise mount up to the top of vertues tower, that, after, he may from thence warre against the vices of his bodie, grief and fear; the first whereof assaulteth us when we begin, the last when we have begun. There are many examples of the valiant souldiers of God, which I would use, but that the ornaments sprung from the wombe of one woman may suffice me, which she brought forth, not at one birth, but with the same piety and zeal. And first I will speak of Eleazar, the cause and example of their passion, and then I will relate what tortures and torments their mother endured: yet cannot man, but onely God determine, who amongst them was first, and who last in this noble agony. They therefore, being all settled in one opinion, resembling one another more in minde then they did in body, duely considered the frailtie of this life, and therefore neither delighted in the flatteries of the world, nor any alluring enchantments thereof. They shewed themselves not to esteeme of torments, fetters, nor no other sorts of tortures imposed upon them: and to return to our first saying, they premeditated patience, to endure whatsoever the judges cruelty could devise. I wil therefore, what I may, praise the fortitude of these brethren, or rather I will with all truth rehearse the most worthy agony of these holy men, which deserves all commendations; and setting M all adulation apart, prosecute with a bare historicall narration the manner of their martyrdom.

But before I begin to declare the death of nobility, I wil a little entreat of reason, which, as I have affirmed, is no small motive to martyrdom. Reason it is, that maketh us observe fasts and use abstinence, it is reason that makes us despise money, and by it we are taught not to account of dignities and honours, which all men generally aime at, yea reasons gift it is that we do resist the heat of lustfull desires. Hence cometh it, that having once overcome such things as the flesh delights in, we finde our selves a little able to resist, we also learn

A to despise pains and torments, and so resolute to suffer all things that shall be imposed upon us. Which, that it may more plainly appear, let us search out the cause of this order; and we shall finde wisdom to be the cause hereof. For no man can determine and distinguish good from evil, that is not endued with wisdom; this wisdom is alwaies accompanied with justice, and justice is still joyned with vertue, and vertue and temperance cannot be separated; so that this wisdom consisteth upon four parts. Besides these, there are two things that either do cause or hinder passion, to wit, pain and pleasure: one of which we do alwayes refuse, and the other we do alwayes desire; yet where pleasure ariseth, and is presently by reasons rule put away, the minde is there strengthened; and pain compared with glory, is through hope of a greater reward contemned before it come; and being come, our minde is ashamed not to suffer that which before it was resolved to do. Reason therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it we despise torments, and detest vice, which like a skilfull husbandman pruneth and cutteth away superfluous branches, and killeth the heat of all corrupt and hurtfull humors, onely leaving that to remain in use, which may some way be profitable to us.

Grief and pain
passion.

Reason resem-bleth a skilfull gardiner.

Thus reason purifieth us by passion, encouraging to suffer, and in our suffering and agony strengtheneth us. Who is not desirous to eat of the flesh of wilde beasts and fishes? And who lusteth not to eat of feathered fowls? nay, do not the daintie dishes got either in sea or land invite us to eat of them? What then causeth us to abstain from them? that all men desire them, yet no man eats them? Even in this thing the minde is taught to overcome it self in delightfull objects, and to bridle all pleasure, that when occasion of martyrdom is offered, the minde setting aside all vanities, will not for a little pleasure forget his accustomed vertue.

For this cause was Ioseph justly praised in that he was not overcome by lust, which reigneth in a youthfull bodie: this reason so worketh with sound advice and mature counsell, that it again recovereth lost friendship, and getteth new, and suffereth no crueltie to be committed. Of this we have also the example of Moses, who had he not just occasion to be angry against Dathan and Abiram, reason (no doubt) would have caused him to have smothered all grief of minde. Did not our father Jacob with great vehemencie reprove his sons, Simeon and Levi, that without reason they had used such crueltie, saying, Cursed be your anger? Which anger and wrath of theirs had it been bridled with reason, neither had they been cursed, nor the other had perished. For this cause, God, the maker of mankind, when he fashioned us and our manners, having finished all lineaments of the bodie, he now placed the minde to be in it, and to rule it, leaving it certain precepts to observe and keep, to wit, temperance, and to imbrace and follow that which is good, and cleave unto justice, and rule and bridle all passions in the body subject unto it, and observe the precepts of God.

chastity.

But some will ask me wherefore we offer to commit wickednesse, seeing that reason ruleth our passion? But it is a ridiculous thing to think that reason so ruleth, for reasons rule cannot hinder the appetite from desire, but onely correct desire, and so prevail, that it suffer with patience the losse or abstinence from such things as it desired. For example sake, reason cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can so work that thou commit no impiety when thou art angry: in like manner, it cannot hinder thee from desiring filthy pleasure, yet can it cause thee not to yeeld unto it.

Reason therefore cannot utterly extinguish vice, but onely bridle it. Witnesse in this the example of holy David, who fighting against strangers with great successe, and being at evening weary and faint, he came unto his princely tabernacle, that was guarded by his souldiers, where he found them all at meat: yet himself being thirstie, durst not drink, notwithstanding water was hard by, onely for that religion dissuaded him, for he had vowed not to drink before he had conquered his enemies. He also forbade his men to drink, so that they might fight more couragiously, if not for that they were valiant, at least for that so they might have drink. Whilst thus his thirst encreased, three young men of strong bodies armed themselves, and taking with them a vessell to put water in, they went unto their enemies camp, and there assaulted the watchmen, who for fear of death fled, and so they past thorow the camp, till such time as they came where the water was, and taking some from thence, they brought it to the King. But holy David so bridled his humane appetite, that by reason he quenched his desire, and shewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the fear of God was to be preferred before all things. For taking the water he had much wished for, and which had been gotten with such danger, he presently powred it on the ground, as a sacrifice to God, chusing rather to die for thirst, then to offend the divine majesty:

majesty: yet reason is not so forcible, that it is able without due consideration to repress the inordinate motions of the minde, and mitigate the griefe of the bodie. But it is now time to come to our history, yet is not this former discourse to be thought impertinent, for that it is somewhat appertaining to the matter ensuing. Such was the wisdom and fidelitie of our forefathers, that Seleucus, King of Asia, enriched our Priests, and being a man of another religion, did ascribe all his actions and worthy deeds to the religion and faith of our ancestors. But wicked mens madnesse could not herewith be satisfied. For one Simon, hating the high Priest Onias, and finding no wayes or meanes to be revenged of him in his own countrey, went unto Apollonius, governour of Syria, Phoenicia and Cilicia, and before him in a publike assembly told him, that he could help the King to an infinite treasure, for (quoth he) there is hidden in Jerusalem an infinite deale of gold and silver, which by right belongeth unto King Seleucus. Apollonius hearing this, praised and commended Simon, and confiscated the gold and silver to the treasure-house of Seleucus; and having authoritie from the King to get it, he levied an army, and so accompanied with Simon, came unto our countrey, purposing if any violence were offered, to use the defence of his souldiers.

When the treasure-house of our temple was now a sacking, Onias wept bitterly, and said, that it was a heaveie sight to them to whom this treasure was committed, to see it, or any part of it taken away. But Apollonius, neither respecting the tears and intreaties of the old men, women, nor children, pressed into the Temple, they all praying God to punish him, and to defend their Temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy Temple, there appeared certain Angels on horseback with weapons in their hands, and shining with a fiery flame about them, and they daunted the courage of this infidell Apollonius, who presently fell down flat upon his face; and lying so a great while, at last he came a little to himself: and rising up, he leaned upon his shoulder who kept the Temple, not being able to stand alone, he was so terrified with the vision he had seen. When he came a little to himself, and was in some hope of recoverie, he stretched both his hands towards heaven, and himself despairing to obtain pardon for his offence committed, he besought the Hebrews (whose Temple he came to spoil) to make intercession for him, himself with tears craving pardon for his offence, and not onely acknowledging his fault, but also confessing himself to have deserved death, and all punishment possible. Holy Onias seeing this, and fearing also that if Apollonius should then die, the Hebrews would be suspected to have made him away, he made prayers to God for him, and so obtained his enemies life. Apollonius presently hasted to Seleucus to let him understand what had hapned: but when he came he found Seleucus dead, and Antiochus reigning in his stead, a man of tyrannous nature, who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high Priest: and therefore made Iason his brother high Priest in his stead; Iason promising Antiochus, in lieu of this good turn, to pay him 3660. talents of silver every year.

This Iason being now made high Priest, and chief amongst all the nation of the Jews, he presently forced all the people to impietie, and to forsake religion; so that to build baths, he hindred the defence and building of the Temple, and all Doctors of our nation conspired with him in this iniquity. But hereat God was presently wroth: who being displeased, it was not needfull to seek forraie enemies, for Antiochus himself was incited to rage against them. Who warring against Ptolomeus king of Egypt, he heard it reported that the Jews did deeme him to be dead, yet was he very gallantly entertained by the inhabitants of Jerusalem: and presently after the fight, he made an edict, that whoso amongst the Jews refused to offer sacrifice to the gods, he should presently die upon the wheel. But the godly minded of our nation did little esteeme this edict, yea the women circumcising their infants (as our law requireth) did afterward cast themselves down headlong, to the end that they might so obtain a present death without longer delay. Antiochus perceiving that the severitie of his edict could not compell the Hebrews to forsake their religion, but that men voluntarily did chuse death; he sitting in an eminent place from whence all the Jews might behold him, calling all of them together, he caused swines flesh to be sacrificed upon the altar, and to be offered to everie Hebrew to eat. Amongst this whole multitude assembled from all places, was one Eleazar a Priest, well instructed in learning, and the fear of GOD, a man of aged yeeres, and of a very reverend countenance, one that was known to all men, and famous for his vertue. To this man Antiochus said thus: Be advised by me, holy old man, to eschew those torments prepared for such as are obstinate, preserve thy reverend age, and concerning not the benefit of this life, take the sacrifice and eat of the swines

A swines flesh: for it is contrary to all wise mens advice to credit the Jewes opinions, and to refuse that meat which nature hath as well ordained for mankind as any other. Wee shew ourselves ungratefull for Gods benefits, who contemne his graces, and make difference where nature hath made none; or what reason is there to shew that this beast is more abominable then others? Either all beasts are to be eaten, or else all to be eschewed: it is superstition and idlenesse to barre our selves from any thing by a law, when we have no other for it but our will. Set apart those vaine and fortish opinions, and at least in this venerable age change thy opinion into better. Or suppose your lawes are forcible and to be observed, yet will they excuse thee, seeing thou dost not sinne voluntarily, but by compulsion.

Eleazar, being permitted to speake, thus replied to Antiochus, who both exhorted and forced him to breach of his lawes. We, Antiochus, do not follow a vaine report, but we observe the verity of religion which our fathers kept, and feare of torments cannot make us embrace another religion, and forsake our owne: yea, suppose our religion delivered to us by our fathers had no firme grounds, yet would I in nothing, no not compell'd by torments, forsake it. Doe not esteeme it a small matter to eate impious meat, and to taste of that which is sacrificed to Idols, for it is a profane thing to touch things that are profane. Our law condemneth your Philosophy, wherein he is most ignorant that thinketh himself most wise. We are taught to embrace sobriety, to subdue in us all inordinate appetite, to keepe our bodies chaste, and to suffer with patience whatsoever for Gods sake is inflicted upon us, and not to deny the truth, justice or piety, or GOD, who alone is true: and therefore I refuse this profane meat, well knowing what I ought to eate, as warranted therein by the precept of the Almighty God, whose lawes I have learned to obey, and eschew all meats sacrificed to Idols, and embrace with all my force that which is expedient for the soule: it is open tyranny to compell any one to that which religion forbiddeth, and to command that which is contrary to justice. Do what thou wilt, mock at thy pleasure, yet shalt thou be more derided then thou thy selfe deridest. I will persist in the holy steps of my forefathers; notwithstanding thou therefore with tyrannous hands pluck out mine eyes, and with a sharpe knife rip up my entrailes, thou shalt never conquer mee. I will die safe and sound, and patient in the love of God; neither flatter thy selfe for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: if need be that I must be sacrificed for Gods sake, thou shalt finde me in these yeares as lusty as a child, as constant as a young man, yea and most joyfull in torments: and prepare an extraordinary fire for me, or what else soever, thou shalt finde mee more constant amidst torments, then now I am before I come to them. O sacred religion! I will never violate thee the foundation of my salvation, the defence of the beleever, the ground of faith; never will I lift up my hands contrary to thy precepts, never will I beleieve any thing to be just, which is repugnant to that which thou hast taught me: I will not lose the merit of so many yeares, nor relinquish the faith I have hitherto embraced. The chaste, pure, and devout company of fathers shall receive me into their number, where I shall not feare (O impious king) thy threats. But thou hast changed the name of king to tyrant, yet thou shalt never alledge against mee my deed, my consent, my word.

E Whilest Eleazar, full of constancy and liberty, spake thus, the souldiers that stood thereabout haled him to be tortured; and stripping him naked, they hangd him up, and whipped him, and whil' st on either side he was beaten, a cryer with an impious voice still cryed unto him, Obey the kings pleasure and command. But worthy Eleazar was not overcome by torment, but suffered all tortures, as though he had beene in rest and sleepe, and did manfully and without feare endure all torments: and fixing his venerable eyes upon heaven, he knew in whom he beleaved, and to whom he sacrificed his soule; and beholding the flesh on each side rent and torne from his body, and the bloud issuing out in great abundance, he admired his owne patience, and thanked God the author thereof. At last, seeing in himself the frailty of all flesh (which is scarcely able to endure so sharp torments) he fell upon his face, which with stripes was all rent and torne, still glorifying God, as he did before his fall. Then one of the souldiers, to gratifie the king, did like a mad man spurn and tread upon him, thereby to increase his torments more. But Eleazar, both strong in body and minde, did like a right champion of the true GOD, never shrink at those paines, but this patient old man did by patience overcome the cruelty of his torturers, so that even the torturers themselves admired, that he endured so many torments. Then the kings officers comming unto him, said, How long Eleazar wilt thou neglect to obey the king, and to free thy selfe from torments? eate of the flesh of swine, and redeeme thy selfe from all thou endurest. Eleazar, although in this martyrdome he had beene silent, yet could he not without answering endure

22 dure to heare so profane counsell, but as tormented with this speech, he cryed out; We sons G 23 of the Hebrewes are not so effeminate as to forsake the way of our salvation, wherein wee 24 have walked even untill our old age, neither are we taught for the avoiding of contumely 25 which will not long continue, to give others example and occasion to sin. It is but a while 26 that this life is to continue: so that wee forsake but a small trifle, yet hope wee for that 27 which is of great moment. Wilt thou tyrant esteeme of us if we should yeeld unto thee?
 28 nay, thou mightst justly reprove our inconstancy. We will therefore dye, and resigne our 29 soules (O venerable father Abraham) into thy bosome.

Elezars last words in the fire.

The soldiers seeing his constancy, did by the kings command cast him into the fire, and poured stinking and loathsome liquors into his nostrils. All which this reverend old man did most willingly suffer, and so was consumed with the flame: yet when nature began to faile, he spake after this manner, lifting up his dazeled eyes to heaven: Thou art he (O God) from whom life and salvation proceedeth: behold, I dye for observing thy lawes, be merci-full to this thy nation, and do not forsake them whom thou hast hitherto protected, even in thy bosome, & under the shadow of the wings of thy clemency, let my death end all misery, & pacifie thy wrath bent against our whole nation for their offences, receive me for them all, & bestow them all upō me. And amidst these speeches he joyfully yeelded up the ghost.

Reasons visible.

It is most true therefore which we at first affirmed, to wit, that the enduring of paines and torments is wrought by our reasons lore: which once determined and resolved, maketh a prosperous suffering of paines with all patience, which wisely advising men to that which is best, doth settle and confirme our opinions to follow it. If therefore reason and the inferior powers be at variance, we must subject them to reason if wee will make a perfect victory.

the rocke.

With this guide of reason our father Elezar was most safely directed, neither to be overcome with paines, nor to give place unto unlawfull inticements and allurements, he saved the ship of his body from all shipwracke that might arise by the tempestuous stormes of vanity, and suffered himselfe with no contrary wind to be driven from the right course: yea, though it was tossed upon the waves of tyranny, yet did it remaine sound and unbroken, and keeping a direct course, arrived in the haven of salvatiō. Never any man did seek so valiantly to defend his city from an enemy, as this holy old man did his soule, who amongst stripes, crosses, and flames, was still the same man he was before. For as the top of a high rocke standeth safe, and resisteth the wave without any damage unto it selfe, even so did the rock of reason in this man beat backe the rage of those tempestuous waves that did beat against his body, not permitting them to breake in and pearce the celestially and divine power of the soule. O happy old man, more blessed then all of thy age, O priest more sacred then all other priests, who didst not pollute thy sacred lips with profane meats, impiety found no entrance that way, from whence so many prayers to God had proceeded. The tyrants cruelty could not prevaile against thee, thou therefore art made an example for all priests of God to imitate. Such a one behooved it a priest to be, more strong then torments, more able to suffer then the torturers to inflict punishment, more forcible then Princes commands, yea and more potent then the fire, wherein thou didst perish: and finally, thou wast ordained to be crowned with the lawrell of martyrdome for thy sufferance. Thou hast surpassed all antiquity, thou shalt be an example to all posterity. If then feeble old age, wherein all strength and heat of body was extinguished, now unfit to suffer torments (as being already broken with age) could by the advice of reason endure so many torments, so many miseries, who dare deny reason to be the chiefe cause of our sufferance? We have seen that all cruelty hath beene over-come by a determination to persist in the service and feare of God: yet many affirme, that not all men who use the advice of reason are able to undergoe such agonies, but their assertion is vaine, and of no force: for most evident it is, that he one-ly is overcome by pain, whom wisdom hath not armed with patience. And no marvell if he, who rashly enterpriseth so waighty a matter, and without due consideration, doe at last forsake and repent himselfe of that which he so unadvisedly undertook. But if we with due advice and deliberation arme our selves, it is not an easie matter to remove us by any misfortune from our determination; when we make account that misfortune will betide us, we are not easily dismayed thereat when it doth betide, for that nothing befell us that we expected not.

Elezars praise.

Therefore he that is wise and valiant is able to conquer his passions, for that he doth well deliberate, and when he cometh to his agony can put his determination in execution.
 Neither is the wisdom of this old man so much to be admired, seeing children, and as it were infants, have so deserved commendations in this point, that they did worke astonishment

A ment in their tormentors, for the courage and cruelty of Antiochus, being overcome by the wisdom of old age, was now the more increased; and by wicked counsel caused seven worthy children of the Hebrews to be brought unto Antioch, out of their Castle Sofandrum, who being young in years, and so as he thought weak and unable to suffer torments, his hope was that either by persuasions or terror or tortures, he might force them to renounce their religion. He therefore commanded these seven, together with their mother Salomona who now grew well in years, to be brought before him: so they according to his command were brought, being of excellent beauty, and worthy children of so virtuous a mother; yea they resembled Angels; their faces shining like the clear light of the Sunne, their eyes sparkled in most comely and decent manner, as testifying that they surpassed in vertue all other of humane race and condition. She was descended of most virtuous and noble parentage, and so she her self had continued and lived; but that excellent feature of body, enriched with nobility of blood and dignity, was now also made more noble by vertue and fortitude, wherein she passed all other things that could be said in her commendations. The Tyrant beholding them, and their mother amongst them, with merry and glad some countenance, he thus craftily spake unto the children: I wish your good (O admirable young men) for so both your beauty of body and noble parentage perswade me: do not therefore like mad men resist my command, avoid not onely torments but death also. For I desire not onely to exalt you unto honour, but also to encrease your riches and possessions, conuerse the superstitious and superfluous belief of your countrey men, and embrace our religion: Which if you refuse to do (as I hope you will not) I will devise all torments, whereby I may by a lingring and painfull death consume you. And to the end to terrifie them the more, he commanded all instruments of torment to be presented unto their view and eye-sight. So wheels, rods, hooks, rakes, racks, cauldrons, cages, gridirons, were brought forth; and engines to torment the fingers and hands, gauntlets, awles, bellows, brazen pots, and frying pans: for these are the names which we finde. For that which I terme bellows, was a thinne plate of iron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a fanne, and farre more horrible devices of torments were shewed unto them, too long to rehearse: whereof they having had a sight, Antiochus said:

Consent unto me, O prudent young men: for if that I command you to commit a sinne, yet do not you offend in doing it, seeing you commit it onely upon compulsion. But the young youths inflamed with a divine spirit and sense, contemned so many kindes of torments, and despised the Tyrants threats and flatteries; and most godly (for they gave him no just occasion) they did drive the Tyrant into a great rage. And by this it is evident how reason is master over passion: for if any slothfull man not before trained up to it, should of a sudden come to such a push, at the very sight of such torments, his minde would have been troubled, and his countenance appalled, his legs under him would have trembled, and he with fear confounded: so that he would presently have stept back from such an agony, and would forthwith have alleadged himself unable to bear so many and so grievous torments, saying, My self being unwise, what should I have made choise of? Whether to endure those torments, or accept of the promised benefits? Whether should I have been moved to pities mine own age, or to compassionate my mother? God would not have denied pardon for this deed, I being forced thereunto: and by doing it though against my will, I shall get the Kings favour. But where reason and advice taketh place, and hath well trained the minde to perfection, the other consequently followeth: As by the example of these brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eat of the sacrificed swines flesh, as they were commanded. Wherefore (said they) O Tyrant dost thou persecute us that are innocents? We both desire and wish to die, and will untill such time as death expelleth life, firmly keep that which God commanded and Moses taught us. And thou Tyrant, do not seek to seduce us by protesting fained love towards us: thou lover of injustice, master of cruelty, deviser of iniquity, the pardon which thou dost offer is to us more painefull then punishment: we are armed with contempt of death, and esteeme not thy words, as being by our late master Eleazar taught to despise them. Why then dost thou esteeme such pusillanimity to be in us young men, seeing of late thou foundst such courage in an old man? We follow him: thou canst not try and know our mindes, except by tearing our bodies thou search them out: we will safely and securely suffer for our God any thing, and leaving this earth we shall be entertained into heaven; and thou for so tyrannizing most cruelly upon innocent souls, shalt be referred to eternall fire.

commanded Maccabeus to be racked.

by threatnings, he caused them to be beaten with buls pizzles: and first of all he commanded G Maccabeus, the eldest of the seven brethren, to be stript, and stretched out upon a rack, and his hands to be bound behinde him, and then to be most cruelly bearen, who wearied his tormenters suffering (so great the force of vertue is) so that they desired more to leave beating him, then he requested they should leave. This done, he was put upon a wheele, and a waight hanged at his feet, and so stretched round about it, that his sinewes and entrailes brake, and so his paines increased: yet he being overcome with paine, his mouth was not for all this stopped or hindred from calling upon God, who beheld all, and reproving the tyrant who devised those torments for the innocents, and taking strength, he is said to have cryed out after this maner; Bloudy tyrant, who persecutest the Majesty of God: I, whom thou thus tormentest, am no Witch, nor one who have murdered and killed another man, but one who dies for justice, observing the law, and for charity. Then when the torturers, overcome with compassion, willed him to submit himself unto the Kings pleasure, he answered: O ye wicked ministers of tyranny! your wheels are not so sharp and cruell, that I thereby will be forced to forsake heaven, whereon my minde is fixed: teare my flesh; yea, if so you please, roast it at the fire: torture and torment each parcell of my body with severall cruelty; you shall for all this finde your selves unable to force us young men to impiety.

The death of
brother.

As he thus spake, a fire was kindled, and he, as he was upon the wheele racked, was so throwne into the fire: and thus he was by flames and torments so burned, that his bowels appeared; his minde nothing moved when his flesh yeelded overcome with paines, who amidst his pangs cryed thus unto his brethren: O beloved brethren, learne of me an example of vertue, consider the strength of an invincible courage, contemne and despise the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God then this tyrant, who can if he please humble the proud and mighty, and exalt the lowly and dejected. As thus he spake, he was taken out of the flame, and layne alive, his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and he put into a frying panne, and so he departed out of this life to the great admiration of all that beheld him; and the joy of his brethren and mother; and went before them to heaven, there to prepare a kingdome for himself and them.

brought.

After him, the second brother, called Aber, was haled by the souldiers: and before the tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he caused all those torments to be shewed him, thereby to terrifie him: but he nothing thereat moved, and denying to eate of that foresaid sacrifice, his hands were bound with iron chaines, and he being hanged up by them the skin of his body was flayne from the crowne of his head unto his knees: so that the entrailes in his brest appeared naked; yet in such maner, as yet he might abide greater torments. For he was cast before a cruell Libard thirsting most extremly after blood, to the intent that he might devoure with his teeth the rest of his body, but the beast smelling of him (no doubt by the great handy worke of Almighty God) forgot his cruelty, and turning away his face, he did no hurt to the Martyr.

But hereat the tyrants rage increased; and the Martyr, by suffering such torments, was made more constant, crying a loud: O how pleasant is that death unto me, which is caused by all sorts of torments for Gods sake! yea, so much the more pleasant, for that I assuredly hope to finde reward for it in heaven. Let these torments inflicted upon me (O tyrant) satisfie thy cruelty, for my paine is not by thy tortures increased, but rather my pleasure, as thou shalt finde by my patience in this agony. More willing am I to suffer then thou to punish, yet my paine in suffering is lesse then thine by inflicting the same upon me. I am tormented for vertue and observing the law, and the justice of God shall banish thee from thy regall seat: thou by tormenting art tormented, and almost consumed, thy wrath and fury being almost spent upon me in vaine, thou shalt not escape the day of judgement: eternall torments are there prepared for thee, which neither thy profaine minde is able to indure, nor thy cruelty of power to decline, thy sinfull soule being condemned to eternall punishments. Thus, remaining constant in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, he departed to heaven.

third brother
is brought.

Then Machir the third sonne was brought, whom all men now pitied for the death of his two brethren, and many exhorted him by his brothers examples to desist from his opinion and so avoid punishment: but he being angry hereat, thus replied, One father begat us, one mother bore us, one master instructed us, we are all of one minde, and all like affected, do therefore no longer prolong the time in vaine. I came hither to suffer, and not to speake, use all your tyranny possibly against this body: for you have no power at all over my soule.

The

A tyrant hereat moved to see this third nothing relent by his brothers death, he devised more cruelty then humane wit alone could invent. Wherefore he commanded a globe to be brought, & tied the holy martyr about it in such sort, that all his bones were set out of joynt, and displaced: whereat the holy martyr was nothing dismayed. The skin also of his head and face was puld off, and then he was put on the wheel: but he could not be rackt any worse, for that his bones were all displaced, and did hang one separated from another in most pitifull manner: and when bloud issued from him abundantly, he was deprived of the use of his hands and feet: but perceiving his life to be spent, he spake thus and died: We, O tyrant, endure this torment for the love of God, and thou the author of such unjust cruelty shalt suffer everlasting paine. Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth, he was put into a frying pan, and so amidst those torments yeelded up the ghost.

B Next after, followed Judas, the fourth brother, whom all the people perswaded and entreated to obey the king: but he, contemning their prayers and exhortations, said thus with all constancy: Your fire shall neither separate nor sever me from the Law of God, nor from my brethren, who instead of this mortall life enjoy life everlasting. I denounce unto thee, O tyrant, destruction and overthrow, but to such as beleeeve, salvation: make triall of me therefore thou cruell wretch, and see if God will forsake me, who hath with open and stretched out armes received my three brethren that are gone before me, and whom the wombe of so holy a mother at severall times brought forth unto glory. The cruell tyrant hearing this, was much moved, and leapt down from his chaire to torment this martyr himself, that so he might overcome him, and in his fury commanded his tongue to be cut forth: C but he hereat not terrified, said to Antiochus, This cruelty will nothing avale thee, neither shalt thou hereby, tyrant, as thou supposest, conquer me. Our God needs not by voice to be awakened, but rather by secret cogitation to be praid unto to help his servants: he provideth for them that hold their peace, and heareth the prayers of such as do call upon him, if they deserve to be heard, and obely requireth purity of soule: For our God knoweth all things before we aske, and before we our selves enter into cogitation thereof, he understandeth our necessity: cut out my tongue, thou canst not cut out my minde while my life remaineth. Those prayers which by it I have uttered to Almighty God, have taught it to suffer: would God thou wouldst so sanctifie all parts of my body by punishing them, for thou therein inflictst punishment on thy self, and reward upon me, and think not that thou shalt thus escape D long unpunished. When he had thus spoken, his tongue was cut out of his mouth, & he bound to a stake, and there he was beaten with ropes endes: and he did patiently endure this, notwithstanding the colour of his face became dead and wan. Being loosed from thence, he was put upon the wheel: and then praying for his countrey men, he by death went unto the rest of his brethren.

Then Achas, the fifth brother, before he was haled to torments, spake in this manner; Behold (thou tyrant) I come to be punished before thou command me, hope not therefore any jot to alter his minde who as thou seest desireth to be tormented. The bloud of my foure innocent brethren, which thou hast shed, hath condemned thee to hell fire: I am to make them up the number of five, that by it thy paines may be encreased. Tell me (bloudy wretch) for what offence by us committed dost thou thus punish us? for what impiety dost thou so persecute us? what villany have we committed? what wickednesse, what naughtinesse have we attempted? This is all thou canst alleadge against us, that we honour God our Creator, and live justly in obedience of his lawes, and therefore do not esteeme thy punishments: but they are to us honour and salvation, and not punishment: we shall be greatly rewarded by God, if no part of us be left free from torment. Whilest thus he spake, his executioners by the Kings command took him and cast him into a brazen pot, and was prest downe in it, his head to his feet: and afterward he suffered all other torments, which his brethren had endured, yet not amazed hereat, he suddenly started up, and thus bitterly inveighed against the tyrant: Cruell tyrant, how great benefites dost thou against thy will bestow upon us! yea, the more thou art incensed against us, the more acceptable to God shalt thou make us: yea, I F should be sorry if thou shewdest mercy upon me. This short affliction gaineth us life everlasting, if this temporall death should not beride me, everlasting life could not befall me. And thus he finisht his agony, and dyed.

Achas, the 5. brother presenteth himself to torments before he was called.

Then the tormenters laid hands upon the sixth brother, who was called Archib, whom the tyrant permitted either to chuse honour or punishment: but he aggrieved at his offer, said, Although (tyrant) I be younger in yeers then my martyred brethren, yet my constancy of minde to theirs is not inferiour: for we were all nourisht up together, all together instructed, and we will all die together in the fear of God. Hasten therefore to thy devised torments, G and that time which thou wouldst spend in exhorting me, spend it in devising tortures for me. Antiochus hereat confounded, commanded him to be bound to a pillar with his head hanging down, in such wise as humors running into it might cause ache: and this done, he caused a fire to be made so far off him, that it could not burn him, but roast him. He also commanded him as he hung to be pricked with awls, that so the heat might pearce into the holes they made in his flesh. Whilest thus he was tormented, much blood like froth gathered about his head and face, and he then spake in this maner, O noble fight! O valiant warre! O strife between piety and impiety! These men have past their agonies, whose Crown Martyrdome is the punishment of their persecutors: I do most willingly follow my brethren, that as by blood I am conjoynd unto them, so by death I may not be separated from them. Devise, O H tyrant, some new torment, for these which thou hast already devised, are already overcome.

O master of cruelty, enemy of piety, persecuter of justice! we six worthy young men have conquered the Kings power, and what his Kingdome or the whole world could afford. Thy fire is cold and heateth not, and the Kings weapons are bended and blunted in our bodies; our God giveth us more courage to suffer, then thou hast to punish: and so the precept of God remaineth firm in us. And as he thus spake, one took hold of his tongue with a hot paire of tongs, and suffering the same torments that his brethren had done, and fried in a frying pan, he gave up the ghost.

Six of the brethren being now dead by diversity of torments, onely one of the seven remained alive with his mother, named Jacob, younger in yeers (but not in constancy) of minde) then the rest of his brethren: he, presenting himself before the tyrant, moved him to compassion, both for that he was left alone, and the last of his brethren, and also that he was to perish: wherefore he called the childe unto him, and into a place where no instruments of torment were, and taking him by the hand, he said thus unto him, hoping to winne him by faire speeches. By thy brethrens calamity thou now well hast learned what is prepared for thee if thou disobey me, deliver thy self therefore from these torments, and I will give thee what honour my kingdome can afford: thou shalt be a Magistrate and Generall of my Army, and one of my Councillers. But perceiving himself not to prevaile, he caused the young mans mother to be called unto him: who coming and standing neer her sonne, the tyrant said thus unto her, Where are now, O worthy woman, all thy children? Behold, K of such a number, if thou please, the destiny affords thee one: advise therefore thy child, and mollifie his obstinate minde by wholesome counsell. The mother having heard what the King said, she inclined her self unto the King: which done, that the King might not understand her, she spake in Hebrew to her childe, as followeth: Pity thy mother, O sonne, and comfort thy sorrowfull mother, who bare thee nine moneths in my womb, and gave thee sucke three yeers, and with great industry have brought thee up to this age. I pray thee, deare sonne, consider the heaven and earth, and all that in them is, and know, that God created them all of nothing, who also of nothing created mankinde. Feare not this Erhmicks paines and torments, but imitate thy brethren, and contemne death, that in the day of mercy I may receive thee and thy brethren againe in heaven. As his mother thus admo- L nished him, he in the Hebrew tongue requested to be unbound, for that he had a secret to disclose to the King: who being unfettered, he presently ran to the torments prepared: for there was a frying-pan red hot, that was prepared for such as were to suffer unto the which the childe coming, remembering his brethren, and beholding also the King, he said unto him, cruell tyrant, I now know thee not onely to have been cruell against my brethren, but even cruelty it self. Wretch that thou art, who gave thee this purple? and who exalted thee to this kingdome and dignity? even he whom thou in us dost persecute, whose servants and worshippers thou killest and tormentest, for which thy wickednesse thy self shalt suffer eter-nall fire and torments which shall have no end. Thou art of higher dignity and authority in this world then other men, yet he that made other men, made thee also of the same nature M that they are: for all men are borne, and must die alike. He that kills another, sheweth that he himself may be killed: thou tearest and tormentest thy own picture and image all in vaine: thou in thy fury killest him whom not long since God created like thy self, and according to the same law, thou thinkest all lawfull which thy kingly power can command: thou pullest out our tongues, and tearest our bodies with flesh-hookes, and consumest us with fire: but they who have already suffered this, have received everlasting joy for their reward; and thou shalt answer for all the punishments inflicted upon them. Thinke not that I expect any favour at thy hands, I will follow my brethren, and remaine constant in our Law. The tyrant

A Tyrant hearing this, was wroth, and caused him to be tormented: but his mother in torment comforted him, and with her kinde hands held his head, when with violence of the tortures blood issued out of his mouth, nose and privie parts, the tormenters not ceasing till life in him was almost spent: but they (by Gods appointment) gave over, and so he took strength again to endure more then any of his brethren had done; at last, his hands and arms being cut off, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and cried, O Adonai, O Saviour be mercifull unto me, and receive me into the company of my brethren, let thy wrath now cease and grant them mercy, who by us doe make intercession to thee; having said thus, his tongue being pulled out, he of his own accord went into the fiery frying-pan, and so to the great admiration of Antiochus died.

B Behold how evident it is, that reason can rule our affections, seeing that children hereby shewed more constancy then the tyrant could shew crueltye. For, it was reasons force that wrought in them that determination to suffer all torments, rather then to forsake the way of salvation. These constant young men do fitly resemble inexpugnable towers; and them, who after a great tempest and shipwrack, do safely enter the harbour of salvation, who guiding their course amidst the boysterous waves, at last obtain the wished shoare. For every one of them strengthened the other by advice and good counsell, and none of them was like an effeminate person, loath to suffer martyrdom. None used delay herein, but one followed anothers example. Let us therefore die for our Law, and imitate the three children whom the Assyrians fury condemned to the fiery furnace, whose patience spred their fame even unto heaven. Whilest thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to passe, that none of them

Reason mistress of our affection.

C offended, but each one resolute in his religion, took example of the vertue, courage and constancy of their forefather Isaac, who understanding that it was Gods will that he should be sacrificed, he refused not to submit his body to his fathers sword. Let us (quoth they) yeeld our soules to him of whom we received both soule and bodie: It is a small matter for us to suffer losse of these members, seeing that we shall in lieu of them receive everlasting blisse: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob doe joyfully expect us, as co-heirs of their kingdome: let us glorifie that wombe wherein we were for ten moneths space, let none of us be more coward then the other, nor none of us degenerate from the other. We that were all begotten of one father, and sucked of one milke, must in all things resemble one another: we had one teacher, True brotherhood.

D and one law inviolate. And in this golden bond of concord were these brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to see the other tormented, but all rejoyced at the others death. O children, whose dignitie farre surpasseth the royaltie of Kings and Princes, whose glory and vertue is unspeakable! None of you were terrified with feare, but you so hastened to your deaths, as though you had onely been to goe to blisse and felicitie: you were truly brethren, who even by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our Nation, and in you shewed us all one example of fortitude: whom therefore I thinke he caused to be so many in number, as were the dayes wherein he created the world, so that these seven brethren may resemble the seven dayes wherein all things were made. And why should we so admire this fortitude in these young men, when a woman armed her selfe with contempt of death? Who indeed is not to be called a mother, but to be honoured with a higher title then humane frailty can afford, who bare into this world so many triumphs.

E For the mother seeing her children dead, was with a kinde and godly zeale inflamed also to suffer: and no marvell, seeing that the very brute beasts if they perceive violence offered to their young, doe oppose themselves to perils in their defence, and protect them with their wings, teeth, and talons: yea and every one that is any way able to make resistance, opposeth herselfe to the enemy to defend her young. And not onely brute beasts doe this; but even Bees doe defend not onely their young, but also their honey, threatening their stings to them that offer to taste thereof, and more esteeming the good of their young then their own lives. But this zealous mother directed by the spirit of God, and reasons lord, hasted that her children might die before her; who not being to live deprived of her children, chose rather to see them die joyfully then to perish in care and sorrow. Therefore when all her family had suffered, she then the last and glory of them all, came to her agony, despising the tyrants threats, and offering her motherly brest to those torments which her children had suffered. O blessed stock and blessed encirclse of the selfe-same wombe! Why should I not affirme that in all lineaments and feature of the body you are like your mother: and if this be a commendation in them, that beside the shape of body receive nothing else of their mother, I will say more of you, that you are like your mother in fortitude, vertue, G and religion; and that you so in all things resemble her, that you are every way equall unto her, save onely herein, that she with her eies beheld the immanity of your torments, being also as constant in her own martyrdome as you in yours. She therefore herein excelled you, that she suffered seven torments before she came to suffer in her own person, and feared in every one of them lest she should be overcome. But O thou example of all women, I cannot tell, whether thou bare these children in thy wombe, or created them, who could with drie eies look upon them whilest they were torne in pieces: yea I say little, affirming that thou patiently didst behold these sights, for even thou thy selfe didst exhort them thereunto, thou rejoycedst to see one of them torne in pieces with fleshhooks, the other to be racked upon the wheele, and the third to be bound and beaten: thou joyfully admiredst the others H burning, and exhortedst the rest not to be terrified herewith, and although whilest thou be-heldest their torments, thy grieve was greater then that which thou hadst in childbirth, yet didst thou frame a lightsome and merry countenance, as though it had been one triumphing. While they were a killing, thou didst laugh, and seeing onely one of all thy children left, hereat thou didst nothing relent. Can I describe how every one perished, seeing thou their mother didst laugh at their deaths, and when their sinews were cut in two, their heads flaine, their tongues pulled forth by the roots, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and cast upon iron plates red hot, and upon wheels, and their ribs pulled in funder, and many other torments for which we want names? Never was any Swanne, which (by report of antiquitie) sung so sweet a note before her death (sweeter then the most melodious har- I mony, and the most pleasant voice) as were the funerall verses of those thy children that perished.

You children were not overcome by the fabulous Syrens enchantments, who to honour God, doubted not to leave your mother without children: And she sprung of noble stock, chose rather to want you for a short time, then to incurre eternall damnation, wishing rather that the bodies of her children should be tormented then their soules. Well she knew, that nothing was more fraile and infirme then our bodies: which though persecution be wanting, are often killed with agues, and abundance of bloud or fluxes: And who is ignorant of shipwrack incident to sailers, hazard of life unto them that travell, and sudden death to those K that live at ease? sudden casualtie by fire, and by the hands of thieves, and a thousand other waies to dispatch our lives? Seeing then that our mortall bodies are subject to so many mi-series to bring us to our end, who would not make choice of a quick dispatch, whereby we lose goods of this world, and gain life everlasting? O thou most reverend of all women, the credit of thy Nation, and honour of our religion, who like the Arke of Noe didst persist invio-late amongst such stormy waves! for as it withstood the force of the deluge, and being built strongly with firme boords, did not suffer any thing within it to perish: so thou suffer-edst not the Tyrant to overcome the holy Ghost which thou hadst received in thy heart.

A similitude
from the Deluge.

Behold of what force and efficacy reason is, which oftentimes maketh us men inferiour to women. For neither was Daniel so terrified at the sight of the Lions, nor the three children with the fiery furnace, as this woman was grieved at the death of all her children, before L she came to her own agony. What would another woman and mother have done in this case, but wept and with pitifull lamentations have cried: Ah wretch that I am, most unhappy, and miserable of all that breathe, who therefore bare so many children into this world, that their severall deaths might be so many severall occasions of my grieve and sorrow! she would have iterated her frequent births, and her toile in her ten moneths bearing them, she would have bewailed her haplesse fortune who brought forth so many deaths and dangers, she would have recounted the milk wherewith she fed them, and their meat she had prepared for them, the pains she had taken with them, how she had carried them in her arms, and sung to them and taught them to speak, her cares, her watchings, her feare, lest any mis-hap should betide them: and with weeping tears would have said, Shall I a grandmother em- M brace your children? who awhile agoe was too fruitfull a mother, and am now deprived of you all? If this day I die, I have none to bury me. But this handmaid of God forgot all these lamentations that another mother would have had, and with an Adamant sense stouter then the never yeelding rocks, did neither forsake her children in their torments, nor in their death, but in a manner compelled them to perish, and never sorrowed thereat. For being apprehended together with her seven sonnes, she considering Eleanors martyrdome, did thus exhort them in the Hebrew tongue. O my most deare and loving children, let us hasten

The mothers speech exhorting her seven sonnes to suffer.

A hasten to that agony wherein we may be a credit to our Nation, and gain of God an everlasting reward: let us without fear present our selves unto those torments which Eleazar aged body endured: call to minde our father Abraham of worthy memory, who having but one onely sonne, did sacrifice him being willed by God so to doe, and feared not to bring him to the Altar, whom he scarcely in his age obtained. Isaac also was willing to be sacrificed by his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things: the like may be said of Daniel and the three children: beleeve me, we are rather tried then tormented. For whatsoever this world affordeth, is mortall and like a shadow.

Thus did this mother arme her childrens mindes with fortitude, and she a woman wrought in men man-like mindes. Last of all, her children being all dead, she, a worthy mother of so many champions, kneeling down in the place of torment, besought of God an end of this life, protesting, that she had not for love of life so long deferred to die, but onely for her childrens sake, and that now she had seen them all seven triumphing. The fury of Antiochus now waxed hot, and he commanded this worthy mother to be tormented, who was (as the Tyrant wil'd) stripped naked, and hanged up by the hands, and most cruelly whipped: her dugges and pips were pulled off, and she put into the red hot frying pan, being most willing to follow her childrens steps in torment; and lifting up her eies and hands to heaven, she prayed for all women with childe, and so yeelded her chaste soule to God. But Antiochus was stricken with fire from heaven. O mistress of justice, who followed thy triumphing children! O conquerer of tyrants, and a looking glasse for all Martyrs! O example of patience! not onely to women, but to all men that shall be after thee, revered of them that now are, and to be worshipped of them that are to come, and to be admired not onely of our Nation, but of all other people. Thy light obscureth the bright shining Moone: and though she fill the world with her brightnesse, yet is she not comparable to thy shining light. Seven lights environ thee about, dazeling the brightnesse of the seven Planets: could any Painter expresse, or any hand in writing declare the torments of your passions? None could with dry eye read or behold them; all people would flock about to see it, all people would praise and esteeme him to have offered a great gift, who to Gods glory had painted that golden stratageme. And if any skilfull workman should engrave this Tragedy upon a sepulchre or in his house, doubtlesse he should be freed from all plague and misfortune. But where could D a stone be found able to contain so many torments? Therefore the old man Eleazar, the mother and her seven sons, are for their nobilitie graced with a sepulchre, and a great reverence is done unto them of all men, yea even by men that are not of our religion: and there is a constellation of eight stars ordained as an argument of their justice, and Angels did execute their funerals. The Tyrant himselfe was astonished to see the constancy of such godly mindes. And thus have they found such favour in the sight of God that they have obtained remission of the finnes of our Nation: For presently after, the Tyrant was destroyed, and Israel there was freed from his tyranny.

But Antiochus, seeing the greatnesse of their faith, and their contempt of death, gathered an army of footmen out of the Hebrews, by whose help he terrified his enemies, and got E great renown. O blessed seed of Abraham! behold what benefit the agony of the mother and her seven sonnes brought to us their countrey-men: let us persist in this piety, that so we may be like our forefathers: behold, the death of a few did end all the miseries and sins of our whold Nation, and you by your countrey-mens hands vanquished your persecutors enemies, and after that victory our finnes were remitted, and last of all, Antiochus being mad, and his entrails devoured with wormes, besmelling most like carrion, gave up the ghost: and was ever after death punished for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Jerusalem to forsake their law, he made warre against the Persians, and there received that which he deserved.

It now remaineth that we briefly repeat all that is before said. For in her agony, this facred mother said thus unto the standers by: Whil' it was lawfull for me, I kept my selfe a F Virgin, and then I married and lived a chaste wife, and forsook not my own house, I brought forth such sonnes as I need not be ashamed of; and though daunted with my husbands death, yet I did not forsake my faith: this, and many things else she recounted. And what more?
She set before her childrens eyes the examples of the Prophets, how Abel by his brother was slain, Isaac to be offered in stead of a sacrifice, how Jacob was banished, Joseph kept in prison, Daniel cast before the Lions, the three children into the fiery furnace: she rehearsed also unto them the book of Esaias, where it is said: Although thou doe goe thorow the fire,
the

the flame shall not burne thee. That of David, The just shall have much tribulation; and Solomon, who proposeth the tree of life to such as doe the will of God; not omitting that of Ezekiel, These dry and withered bones shall live again: Also that of Moses Canticle, I will kill and restore to life, and the length of your dayes is in my hand. Unhappy tyrant, what did thy cauldrons red hot, and thy torments profit thee? what availed thee to cut away their eyelids, and to pull out their tongues? thou thy self for so doing dost now endure far worse then all these. And they whom thou killedst (beleeve me) enjoy everlasting comfort, and are now secure of blisse and revenge. For they who suffer for Gods sake, shall have happy successe, when God the Father of all things, shall reward them with life everlasting that follow him. Thus have I consecrated these worthy memorials, which I finde in the holy Scriptures of the sacred Maccabees, to the reading of all men, that shall live in any age hereafter.

FINIS.

An exact and orderly Collection of all the Scriptures which are handled by Iosephus in his History of the Antiquitie of the Iewes, set down in Chapter and Verse as they lye in the Bible, whereby a man may finde on a sudden any thing wherein the Authour doth either expound, enlarge, or alter the words of Scripture. And hereby the Reader may turne to every Verse as familiar as in the Bible.
